Africa Flight

By Val Gielgud

He stopped in his restless prow and stared down on to the Embankment. Through the trees he could just catch a glimpse of the gilded eagle on the Air Force War Memorial.

"Well, it must depend on the verdict of the court martial, mustn't it?"

Sir George shrugged his shoulders. "They'll break him all right — bound to," he said. "Question is — what will Larrimore do?"

Miss Wright looked up with eyes astonishingly kindly and shrewd. "You'll have to catch him quick if you want him, Sir George. If I'm not very much mistaken in him, he's the type of man who'll be off to the ends of the earth in quick time."

"Which, my dear Cynthia, is just why my plan should appeal to him. Where is that newspaper?"

There came a knock on the door. A small boy slipped in noiselessly, handed a folded evening paper to Miss Wright, and slipped out again.

"Well?" barked Sir George, as the paper rustled.

"Dismissed the Service — unfit to serve His Majesty in any capacity — the usual headline stuff."

Sir George swung back to the window. "Right you are!" he said quietly.

"Get me Larrimore to this office at eleven to-morrow morning. And I suppose that means Hubert, as well, if we're to get things approximately settled. And I must have a definite delivery date for the plane. You'll ring up the factory. Cancel any other engagement I may have for to-morrow morning—and I'd better keep lunch-free in case Larrimore needs buttering up. And warn young Jorlocks, that new publicity man of ours."

"I know, Sir George."

"You would!" Sir George grinned and tossed the butt of his cigar out of the window. "I'll be here a little after ten."

"I'll be ready for you, Sir George."

The Chairman of Associated Airways, Limited, picked up his hat and stick, and lighted a fresh cigar.

"New plane — flight for archeological purposes — record over desert—it all looked a bit stodgy, Cynthia. But throw Rupert Larrimore into the omelette, and it'll look quite a different and quite a tasty dish!"

CHAPTER III THE BIG IDEA

Big Ben was just striking eleven on the morning of the following day, when Rupert Larrimore walked into Sir George Manson's office.

Miss Wright observed him with carefully concealed interest, as she got up from her desk and apologized for her Chief's lateness. He was pale certainly. His lips were closed in a thin line like a trap, and his prominent jaw was set like cast steel.

He walked with swift movements, admirably co-ordinated, straight across Miss Wright's outer office and through the further door into Sir George's sanctum. He did not turn until he reached the fine Adam fireplace at its further end. Then he swung on his heel, and stood rocking a little on his feet.

Miss Wright remembered watching the greater cats behind bars at the Zoo, and had a momentary feeling of discomfort.

"I'm sorry Sir George is late," she said. "I'm expecting him any minute."

Larrimore gave a short laugh. "I rather anticipated punctuality," he said. "My time's valuable you know—especially now it's all my own."

"Naturally," agreed Miss Wright. Rupert Larrimore stared. He had hoped for an excuse to make a scene.

"I'm not going to wait for more than five minutes," he said. Again Cynthia Wright refused to be drawn.

"I don't think you'll have to," she said pleasantly. "Do sit down. Can I get you anything? A cigarette, or a newspaper?"

Larrimore jerked up his head and grinned. "Thanks, no. I've read all the papers I want to see for quite a time."

Miss Wright flushed. "That was stupid of me, I apologize. I'd forgotten — you must have found them disagreeable this morning."

"I see. You know all about me, I suppose?"

"Doesn't everyone?" Larrimore sat down on the arm of a big chair, and groped for his cigarette-case.
