The Woman who Loved — And Earned

BY JANE PHELPS

A Modern Story of Home and Business

CHAPTER III.

Then one night, walking home from the movies, Robert asked me to marry him. I was happy. Oh, so happy! because I loved him. I had pretended to Mary Ryan that he was no more to me than others, but it wasn't so. He meant all the world to me, all of happiness. And I told him so, and in the telling felt no shame. Why should I? Why should any girl, once she knows the man to whom she has given her heart, honestly loves her and wants to have her for his wife?
 I have no patience with the sickly sentimentality that makes a girl make pretence of holding her lover off because he might think her anxious.

So I told Robert I would be his wife in the fall. It was the last of July when he asked me.
 Throughout the daylight hours of August and September I worked doubly hard in the shop, and devoted the evenings I did not spend with Robert to getting my simple trousseau ready. The time slipped by almost imperceptibly, so happy and so busy was I. Mary Ryan helped me in every way.

"If you are bound to make a goose of yourself, why I might as well help even if I don't like your getting married, she had grumbled as she stitched away on a negligee.

"It won't make any difference in my feeling for you, Mary, so don't be so grumpy about it," I replied. I couldn't help feeling a little hurt that Mary should object to my marrying.

"Oh, get out! Don't I know that when a girl gets married she might as well be dead for all the comfort she is to anybody but the man she marries—sometimes she ain't even to him. Here I was plannin' how we would live together when we got old, the fine times we would have learnin' to cook"—she stopped in pretended surprise, "goodness, Gerry, you can't get married! You don't know a blessed thing about keeping house, or cooking."

"I am not going to keep house," she said.

"What are you plannin' to do? Hire a housekeeper and cook on a ship clerk's salary?"
 "I am planning to keep my position, Mary. I shall go on working just the same. And Mary, please do pronounce your g's. I hate to keep telling you."

"Maybe I don't wish I had gone to high school like you, before I had to work to keep from starving!"
 "Don't speak so bitterly, Mary. You know as much as I do, more about some things—the shop, etc."

"Don't think I am a fool enough to swallow that, Gerry Frost. I ain't like a fool what don't know the real thing when they see it. I have got sense if I ain't got education. And I know you was all to the merry the first day you come to the shop. I'm going to work like blazes and some day I'll be a saleswoman too, you see if I ain't."
 "You surely will if you try. You are naturally much smarter, much cleverer than I am," I assured her, "and I will help you learn to speak more grammatically if you will let me. I should study too, and so we will be helping each other." I was little anxious as to how Mary would take my offer. She was proud, and high spirited.

"Honest, Gerry Frost, do you mean that?" Mary's eyes suddenly overflowed. "I never thought anyone would care enough about me to learn me anything."

"Of course I mean it—that is, if you won't mind being corrected."
 "Mind!—not on my life! But I reckon it will keep you pretty busy."

So it was settled. Mary was to learn to speak correctly. I was to teach her—learn her, she persisted in saying.

She was quiet for a moment, then "Say, Gerry, does Robert know you are going right on working at the shop?"
 "Yes—that is, we haven't talked much about it. At first he objected terribly, but now he isn't quite so insistent. I made him see how foolish it would be. I earn as much, almost, as he does. (I earned fully as much, but I would not let even Mary know it for fear she would not think quite so well of Robert.)"
