THE GREEN SHADOW

by HERMAN LANDON

PLOT AND COUNTERPLOT

From the telephone booth Dale taxied to his bank, arriving there just before closing time. In exchange for his personal check he received two one-thousand dollar notes and forty-eight one-dollar bills. The accommodating bank clerk selected fresh crisp currency and snapped a rubber band around it, forming a compact bundle about as thick as Dale's middle finger.

With a careless air Dale dropped the bundle into his inside coat pocket and went back to his taxi. His next stop was 262 Bank street, and here he paid and dismissed the driver. Without expecting a too cordial reception he ran up the steps and rang the bell. It was a new face that answered his summons—the face of a man considerably younger than Axelsson. He was dark and lithe and slin, with sharp features and a cautious expression.

"Is Mr. Ferryman in?" he inquired.

"You will find him in the next house, sir, 260."

Dale studied the fellow for a moment. He reflected that Ferryman was not particularly fortunate in his selection of servants.

"You are new here, aren't you? What's become of Axelsson?"

"Axelsson is no longer here, sir. He left this morning. The servant started to close the door in Dale's face. 'I doubt if Mr. Ferryman will see you sir. He is not receiving callers today. But you might try—oh, here he comes.'"

A tall, bareheaded man appeared on the stoop of the adjoining house. "Wish to see me?" he asked. "Oh, it's you, Mr. Dale." A chill crept into his voice. "I saw some one from the window, and I wondered. I can spare you a few minutes."

He came down the steps, crossed over to 262, and with frigid politeness motioned Dale to enter. They walked into the library. Ferryman was holding himself a little more erect than yesterday, but traces of shock and grief remained in his fine face.

"Be seated, Mr. Dale. I am rather surprised to see you after what happened here last night."

Dale smiled genially. "I saw Captain Summers at luncheon. Queer sort, Summers, physically and mentally. His head is too large, and there are too many crazy notions in it. He gave me a vague idea of what occurred in this house last night."

Ferryman regarded him suspiciously. "You were here, weren't you, in role of the Picaroon?"

Dale laughed. "That's one of Summers's refreshingly original ideas. Well, when a man has a head as big as his, he has to fill the blank spaces with something."

Ferryman's eyes were still full of distrust. "Captain Summers telephoned me an hour ago. He had a very astounding report to make."

A frown of perplexity gathered on his forehead. "The pearls have been recovered."

"Congratulations," Dale murmured. "Oh, I didn't care greatly about the pearls. They are valuable, to be sure, but of what use are they to me now? My poor wife will never wear them again." His voice broke, but in a moment it gathered strength again. "There is only one thing I live for now, and that is to see that the murderer is properly punished."

Dale inclined his head sympathetically. "That's a natural sentiment, Mr. Ferryman. But tell me, you don't really believe that the Picaroon murdered her?"

The other man hesitated. His face showed a conflict between stern emotions and gentle ones, between grief and vindictiveness. "I am not convinced," he murmured. "It is strange that the Picaroon should have returned the pearls. And there are many other incongruities that complicate the matter." He raised his head a little. "I didn't like the way Axelsson acted last night. In a twinkling, as I looked into his face, all my former feeling with regard to him changed. All at once I was filled with distrust. This morning I discharged him. I don't know whether or not I was justified."

Dale looked about the room which had been the scene of Miss Castle's interview with Dr. Moffett and of his own exciting encounter with Captain Summers last night. Something seemed to have disturbed its former state of order and neatness. Things were scattered about, the furniture had been disarranged, there were signs of some one's hurried departure.

"Yes, I noticed it this morning," said Ferryman, following his glance. "I called Axelsson's attention to it, and he acted gulien and discourteous."

Then I discharged him. There is no longer any doubt in my mind but what certain persons have been making improper use of my house, possibly with Axelsson's connivance. If so, I hope they are gone for good."

He sighed. "You were inquiring about a certain Dr. Moffett the other day. Lately I have been thinking that perhaps such a person exists."

"You have learned something?" Dale asked quickly.

Ferryman hesitated. For just a moment he seemed inclined to take Dale into his confidence, and then his face closed up again.

"No, nothing definite. In fact, I have had only the vaguest sort of inkling. Besides"—with a glance over the confusion in the room—"all that appears to be happily ended now."

Dale frowned a little. Last night's excitement, together with the subsequent discharge of Axelsson, had evidently prompted Dr. Moffett to make new arrangements in great haste. This development was not to Dale's liking. His task had not seemed so difficult as long as he knew where the enemy could be reached. Now he would have to trace him to his new quarters.

Doctor Moffett had added elusiveness to his other formidable qualities. That would mean a new problem to solve and consequent delay.

In the midst of his reflections he found Ferryman regarding him with an intent puzzled expression.

"You are a bewildering person, Mr. Dale," he now murmured with a faint, uncertain smile. "I should distrust you, perhaps hate you, even abhor you as a murderer, but as I sit here looking at you I somehow can't feel that way toward you. Either I am a very poor judge of character, or else"—he paused, his eyelids drew together, a frown came— "I don't know," he finished lamely.

Dale laughed. "Afraid to trust instincts, Mr. Ferryman? Well, that's natural. I'll make you a promise. Inside of a few days—within a week at the most—the murderer of your wife will be brought to justice."

He rose, wondering if he had made too harsh a promise. Ferryman rose also and followed his caller to the door. There, with still a trace of reluctance in his manner, he offered his hand. Dale shook it. He could see that, although he had not won the older man's confidence, he had made a good impression.

Half an hour later he was again in a telephone booth.

"Yes, he called only a short while ago," Miss Castle told him. "He is going to telephone again at 9."

"Splendid!" Dale glanced across his shoulder through the glass panel in the door. A lanky person in a shabby gray suit was dawdling at the nearby counter. He lowered his voice. "I'll call at half past-eight, if I may. That will give us half an hour for deliberation."

"Oh, do come!" said Miss Castle eagerly. "I'll go mad unless I can talk to some one."

Dale strolled out into the sunshine again. For a while he amused himself making divers short turns, doubling back on his course occasionally, dipping into subway entrances and out again, and after an hour of such maneuvers the lanky person in gray was no longer in sight. He laughed at his successful dodge, stopped at an exclusive shop window to inspect a display of neckwear, and in a moment he grew conscious of some one's furtive and deliberate scrutiny.

"Another," he mumbled. "Well, well!"

He turned away and leisurely sauntered down the street, pausing shortly before another shop window. This one had mirrors at three sides, and in one of them he saw a tall loose jointed, stylishly garbed person who shortened his steps as Dale stopped.

"Paul Ainsworth, alias Doctor Moffett," he mused. He fingered his jaw and smiled wryly at a recollection. Then he swung around suddenly.

That gave an individual charm to her dark beauty. She looked up at him with a vague smile and gave him her hand.

"Are we alone?" Dale asked, glancing about the stately room.

"Yes, father is still at the office. I have left instructions that I am not at home to any one, but am to be called if I should be wanted on the telephone. Oh, by the way, did you see that horrid editorial in the Sentinel?"

"No. What's the yellow rag howling about now?"

"About the mysterious Mr. Graves. It says he must be exposed and punished in justice to the thousands of poor people he has swindled out of their pitiful savings." He face flushed. "It says the failure of his police to apprehend him amounts to a public disgrace. It isn't fair. It's cruel! Poor father! He is working day and night so he can make restitution."

DELIGHTFUL SEA TRIP OFFERED BY EASTERN S. S. COMPANY

Many residents of New Brunswick plan for a trip and vacation in the United States at this period of the year. Eastern Steamship Lines, which make four round trips each week between Saint John and Boston, offer a delightful sea trip as a start to such a vacation. Those who plan to go to New York City, which is famous for the sight-seeing possibilities it offers, particularly during the summer, will transfer at Boston to the Eastern steamers "NEW YORK" or "BOSTON" which both sail on the only direct all water route between Boston and New York. These ships travel through famous Cape Cod Canal and are always in sight of land. The coast line between Boston and New York and the trip through Long Island Sound and the East River and past the Battery in New York are most interesting.

Upon arrival in New York, those who plan to travel farther south may then embark upon another steamer

After half an hour's aimless roving he dismissed the taxi and dined at a hotel. He lingered over his after-dinner cigar and coffee, then took a walk. At precisely half-past 8 o'clock a servant ushered him into the Castle drawing room.

Adele was there waiting for him. She was in a simple evening gown

SEVERE ITCHING BURNING ECZEMA

Covered Chest and Throat. Healed by Cuticura.

"Eczema broke out in a rash and covered my chest and throat. It was of a wet nature and the itching and burning were so severe that I scratched and caused eruptions. My clothing aggravated the breaking out on my chest, and the irritation prevented me from sleeping. The trouble lasted about three weeks."

"I tried several remedies without helping me. I began using Cuticura Soap and Ointment and after applying them once I felt greatly relieved, and in about two weeks I was completely healed." (Signed) Mrs. Harry McCormack, Newburgh, N. S., June 23, 1929.
