Gold Mines Provide Tungsten Ore Refined in Ottawa

(By Bruce West) War in the Pacific has suddenly made Ottawa the home of one of the country's most important ore refineries. Surprising as this may be to those who have always looked upon the capital as a centre of government rather than a mining city, it possesses the only plant in Canada which refines tungsten, a metal more precious than gold to the war factories of the country.

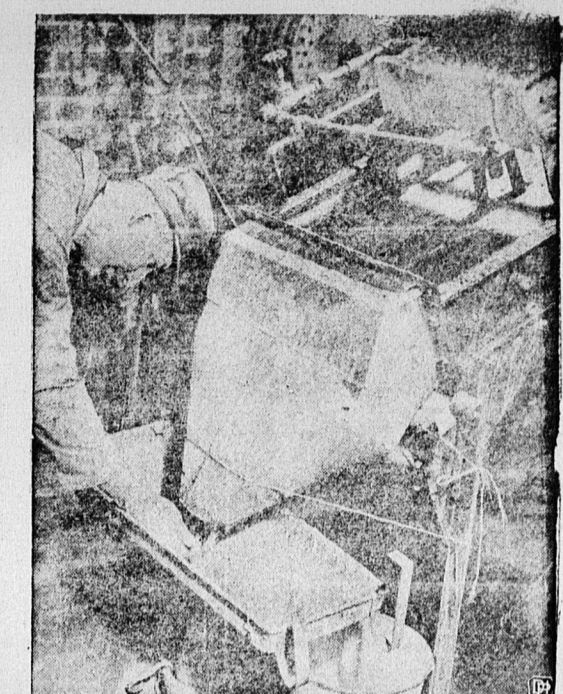

The mines which supply the scheelite sort it by hand from the gold ore. A conveyor carries the ore beneath a violet ray lamp and the sorter picks out the chunks that glow with flakes or strips of tungsten. When a car load has been gleaned by this method, it is shipped to the Ottawa refinery.

The gold mines do this work on a patriotic basis. Because the smallness of the deposits makes it necessary to sort the scheelite by hand and freight it to Ottawa, they actually lose money on it.

Ultra violet rays are used to detect the metal, and portable lamps are now being made for the modern prospector. As illustrated here the tungsten glows whitely under the violet rays, while the rest of the scheelite ore remains dark.

In a small but modern refinery at the Bureau of Mines, in Ottawa, tungsten is being refined for the Canadian tool steel industry. Workman is shown examining some of the precious tungsten concentrate as it comes from the mill.

This is tungsten concentrate, fresh from the mill. Used as a hardening agent in the manufacture of tool steel, it is added to the melting pots in this form. Canada and the United States have been largely dependent upon China for their tungsten. The Mines Bureau has already produced more than thirty tons—enough for a great number of tools so vital to the war industries of the country.

Commandos Pull Another Raid, Smashing Nazi Garrison, Destroying Oil Plant on Norwegian Coast

Britain's famed Commando units are harassing the Germans at will these days. Twice in a week the Commandos have smashed the Nazi forces on the Norwegian coast in daring operations as these pictures, radioed from London to New York, reveal. The first raid was carried out by land, sea and air forces on the port of Vaags, which is a port for German convoys carrying supplies for operations in the far northern part of Russia. It was perfectly timed, with the British forces routing the garrison, killing half of it and capturing most of the remainder along with a number of Quislings.

In the picture at LEFT British soldiers are shown leading away a group of German prisoners. Flames from a blazing oil factory are shown (CENTRE), after the Commandos fired it. Casualties on the British side were light. A few wounded are shown being taken aboard ship after the raid (RIGHT). News of this raid had hardly been announced when it was reported the Commandos had stabbed again at the Lofoten Islands, also off the Norwegian coast. They remained there several days, sank a Nazi patrol ship and downed a German plane. The report said German communications in the district were completely disrupted.
