CHAPTER XXXII

Zoe's presence was absolutely superfluous at Star Hundred, she told Helen, after receiving her sister-in-law's smiling announcement that she had accepted Guy. Here at last, Zoe said, was the marriage which could be accurately described as "safe." She sent Zoe a subtle smile, to supplement the one from Helen, and asked him to arrange for the announcement of the engagement in the Washington and Arkansas papers. And she warned Lady Grenville that it would be differently worded from the one prepared for the London press.

somewhere in the middle of the paper so that people will have to hunt for it. I think it's very characteristic of the two schools of thought. "You can't complain of the British school of thought yourself. Zoe All our reviewers have sung your praises to the sky." "Yes, they've been very good to me. I appreciate it too. I haven't told you, because we've all been so absorbed in Helen, but Mr. Sampla and I have agreed on another book. I must go up to London next week to sign the contract. After that I think I'll go over to France, to one of the quiet places in Normandy that I'm fond of, and begin the rewriting of the sketches and do the current pieces for World Kaleidoscope at the same time. When Helen gets ready to come over I'll join her in Paris. Then we can see about getting a car and starting for Spain." They all tried, amiably and affectionately to deter her from leaving, but at the same time they were forced to admit that her plan sounded pleasant as well as practical. London had never been one of Zoe's favorite cities and her approach to it, lined by the grim, gray air raid shelters, had given her an uneasy sense of forbidding. Nostalgia for the quiet countryside of France suddenly filled her being, and as soon as she had signed the contracts, she took a plane from Crofton to Deauville, feeling that she could not bear to retard her arrival any longer, even by hours.

CAPITOL - NOW PLAYING

DEDICATED TO AMERICA'S SHARPSHOOTERS OF THE SKIES! One of the most dramatic stories in Paramount's exciting story of the Air Corps trigger men, "Aerial Gunner," takes place in the embattled Pacific when the bomber flown by Richard Arlen makes a forced landing near a Jap scouting party on one of those myriads of South Pacific Islands. Most of the bomber's crew were killed in the air combat that wounded the plane, leaving Arlen, Chester Morris and Dick Purcell to repair the stricken ship and bring it back to its base. While Arlen and Purcell are feverishly repairing the bomber's engine, Morris, armed with a tommy gun, holds off a party of attacking Japs. Arlen and Purcell fix the plane and get ready for their take-off. Heroically blasting the Japs until his bomber makes a getaway, and finally hit by a grenade, Morris falls knowing that he saved the bomber and his comrades' lives. The fighting action story of the sharpshooters of the sky, "Aerial Gunner," opens today at the Capitol Theatre starring Richard Arlen, Chester Morris and Jimmy Lydon, and features Dick Purcell and Ida Lupino in the supporting cast. The picture was produced by William H. Pine and William C. Thomas. Pine directed the picture.

All That Glitters

By Frances Parkinson Keyes "I think it would be wonderful. But you don't do it, Guy. You'd be perfect in that position." "You would too, you know." His clasp on her hand grew a little firmer, his expression of earnestness still gladdened. He waited without impatience for her to return his expectant smile. She did so with no confusion, and with the warmth which had always charmed him. "Are you sure you think so?" "In case of it, I think you'd do much better at it than as mistress of Sycamore Forest or as Admiral's Lady in Shanghai."
