NO picnic is complete without Sussex. Inviting hampers full of all the good things, of course. But be sure, too, that there's a generous supply of good old Sussex to cool thirsty throats, to comfort and refresh. And there's a full selection in the Sussex line—the famous Pale Dry and Golden Ginger Ales and a dozen delicious fruit flavours at your command. Sussex has been known and appreciated by Maritime connoisseurs for half a century.

SEES NO CRIME IN SWING BAND

NEW YORK, July 12—(CP) — A complaint of three New York residents against a neighboring "swing band" which they claimed played the dickens with their sleep" was dismissed by a magistrate. He held swing music, whatever else it may be, is not a breach of the peace. The orchestra leader told the court his band was so constructed that all surplus sounds were directed away from the residential section. Anyhow, he said his band was not a swing band but a novelty band. He admitted playing "Flat-foot Floogie, and "Mamma, I want to make rhythm" —but only on request, he said.

3 Strange Men

"Your father thought you wouldn't. That is why he sent the instructions."

"Great fun, isn't it?" George grinned bitterly.

"Don't worry, Mr. Parmitter. Your father isn't enjoying it —I can tell you that."

At this moment there was a knock on the door.

Mr. Torkney paused, went slowly to the door, and opened it wide.

"Ah, Mr. Diggs!" he said. "Come in."

Ephraim Diggs, undertaker was a prim, deferential man of about forty. His black clothes seemed to heighten the pallor of his shaven face, so that he looked not unlike a corpse re-vivified with faint signs of excitement. After introduction, he sat down on a chair almost facing Torkney's table, and at an angle from George, who noted chiefly his profile and with an involuntary feeling of repugnance.

Torkney produced from a drawer some papers for reference, saying, "I have been explaining to Mr. Parmitter, who is interested in the proper disposition of this affair, that some features were disclosed to you yesterday. "Here —" laying down a paper—"is your undertaking to observe the necessary legal provisions. Here is a form of receipt which you can sign presently. I presume you have thought this over, Mr. Diggs, and are prepared to go on with it?"

"I am," Mr. Diggs replied solemnly.

"Very well. Have you any acquaintance in Bristol?"

"Bristol? No."

"Or in Manchester?"

"Can't say that I have."

Torkney scanned his papers. He seemed to be listening. "Do we go on with this, Mr. Parmitter?" he said looking over to George. "Oh wait a little longer?"

"Carry on," said George, still interested in the profile of Ephraim Diggs.

"Some mistake?" queried Mr. Diggs, fingering his knees.

"No. No mistake." Torney waited again, while the nervousness of Mr. Diggs increased. Then Torkney said, as if he had been taking in a supply of eloquence, and was now full "I shall cover the point you already know," and began to launch the full flow of what he had to say at the head of the undertaker from Leicester.

George watched the man receive it. It was as if he were slowly battered speechless by something he could not understand. Yet neither his face nor his movement was devoid of a certain quietude that dwelt in him Undertakers are like that.

"You realise it, Mr. Diggs, do you?"

"Quite," said Diggs, interlocking his fingers tightly. For a moment he glanced over to George, who had nothing to say, nor sign to give

"I have yet to tell you," Torkney went on, "that there is a man in it from Bristol, and another from Manchester, on exactly the same terms as yourself. That is my last point—and the reason why I asked you these questions. You won't meet. In any case, there is to be no collusion. The chance is worth the effort, for I take it the chances are equal."

"Effort?" echoed Mr. Diggs. "Oh yes —quite."

"I would face death for such a chance," said Torkney in a perfectly indifferent tone, 'if it were my concern."

"Face death?" said Diggs. "I'm used to that, I think. 'O Death, where is thy sting?'" It was perhaps nervous excitement that impelled the undertaker to smile at his own words, but the lawyer smiled, too and so kept him in countenance.

"Then," said Torkney, 'you may sign for this chart that is addressed to you. If any unforeseen obstruction arises to prevent your going further at any point, or if you find yourself in need of financial assistance, let us know. Our instructions extend to that." He placed a document for signature, along with a seeled envelope addressed to Ephraim Diggs in Geoffrey Parmitter's scrawled handwritting.

Mr. Diggs got up, moved to the table, signed his name, and received the envelope, which went after a turn-over scrutiny, into his pocket. Then, looking hard at each other, he and Torkney shook hands.

"Thanks," said the undertaker, apparently bemused. "I'll get out—into the air. Hope I'm not abrupt." For a moment, however, he appeared to recover a lost professional manner, as if he remembered that he was here merely to measure the body or name a price for the funeral. But it disappeared as he glanced at the steady, brooding gaze of George Parmitter. "Goodday," he said.

George opened his lips, but no answer came.

Mr. Diggs turned his back on them, and the lawyer came back from closing the outer office door, and smiled a little shrewdly.
