"Here we are!" Becker announced. "They'll all be beating it outside in a few minutes to see the fighting, and then we'll have the joint to ourselves. What's it to be, Major?"

"I suppose it's no use asking for a whisky and soda?" that gentleman inquired wistfully, glancing uneasily about him at the groups of half-seen men.

"Well, you won't get Scotch," Becker told him. "But if rye is good enough I guess they can fix us up with seltzer. It's what I'm drinking myself."

"That would be admirably," the Major agreed.

They seated themselves on one of the wooden benches, and a few moments later a boy brought their drinks and set them down on an upended barrel which served as a table.

"Here's looking at you, Major!" Becker proposed, when the boy had departed; and the Major responded suitably and sipped his drink delicately. Rather to his surprise he found it quite good.

"Well, and how are you finding things here?" Becker asked casually.

"Not at all well," the Major told him sombrely.

"Uh-huh?" Becker responded, in a tone nicely blended of inquiry and sympathy; and thus encouraged, the Major proceeded to relate the tale of his sorrows.

He explained that the sugar estate had proved a most lamentable disappointment; the other assets, such as the house, were of small value; and by the priest's account, the balance at the bank was almost non-existent. He hinted that he was far from satisfied by the latter's statements, however, and finally allowed it to be inferred that he was likely to be an actual loser by the whole affair.

He said nothing about the lost clue and the priest's story of the treasure at the moment, for in spite of his companion's mysterious hints at their first meeting, he was uncertain how much Becker knew of his brother's affairs. In any case, he felt it would be wiser to hear what the American had to say about the general situation first.

By the time he had finished the narration of his troubles the place had cleared of men to a great extent, and in obedience to Becker's silent signal their glasses had been replenished.

"Well, all this is vurry interesting, Major," Becker said slowly. "But I warned you right along that you wouldn't get much out of that estate, you'll remember."

"You did," the Major admitted. "But I wasn't prepared to find that it was practically valueless. I consider that Maloney was remiss, to say the least of it, in not informing me of the true state of affairs in the first place. But as a matter of fact, I've found him a thoroughly unsatisfactory person in every way."

"Is that so?" Becker asked interestedly. "Thoroughly unsatisfactory, eh? Well, I'm not going to say I'm surprised. But when you say 'in every way,' just what are you referring to?"

The Major hesitated.

"Well—just that," he returned evasively. "He seems to have very little real information about my brother's affairs—other than in relatively minor matters." "Is that so?" Becker repeated, but slowly and thoughtfully this time. "I suppose he's come clean as far as your own personal interests are concerned—where you could get the information from outside anyway. But when it comes to Miss Salter's interests . . . ."

"I—I don't quite . . How do you mean?" the Major hedged, taken unawares by this direct reference, and unable at the moment to make up his mind how to respond to it.

Becker was surveying him with a look of faint surprise on his face.

"Well, after all, she is mainly concerned, isn't she?" he demanded.

It was obvious that he knew more than the Major had given him credit for, and that gentleman eyed him uneasily.

"Er—yes, she is," he admitted at last. "But I don't know how you guessed it."

"Who said I was guessing?" Becker asked, with a hint of reproach in his voice. "I told you back in Havana that I know quite a bit about Tom Salter's affairs, Major. Well, among other things, I knew just how he'd planned to dispose of his—properly, shall we call it. And unless he'd changed his mind in the last couple of months, I knew that Miss Salter would be mighty interested."

The Major stared at him in something like dismay.

"Then you know all about this—this . . ?"

". . . This gold cache, you mean?" Becker finished for him, lowering his voice and glancing about him. "Sure I know about it. Haven't I as good as said so all along?"

The Major blinked at him uncomfortably. Now he came to think of it he saw that this was true. Much that he had not understood at the time bore out what Becker now said, and he realised that it was only his own ignorance of the facts of the case which had prevented him from seeing it before.

Work Rushed At Air Fields

OTTAWA, June 19— (CP)—Buildings on 52 of the airfields required for the British Commonwealth Air Training Plan are in use or under construction, the Department of Munitions and Supply said tonight.

On 21 fields, the training schools have been completed or old buildings converted to needs of the air training plan.

On another 21 fields, construction of buildings is well advanced, while on another 10 fields work has started. On these 10 fields, the construction will be completed in periods varying from one to two months.

Upwards of 80 airfields are to be in use in connection with the air

Requirements For Training Schools Under Air Plan

Details of the selection and development of sites for the Commonwealth Air Training scheme were given by Hon. C. G. Power, Acting Minister of National Defence, in the House of Commons last week. As noted in the Canadian Press dispatch of June 13, these included expenditure of 750,000 for a service flying training school at Summerside and $800,000 for a bombing and gunnery school at Charlottetown.

Mr. Power in enumerating the undertakings gave the following estimated requirements for one typical bombing and gunnery school: 6 hangars, 224 ft. by 160 ft.; 1 guard house; 1 hospital (34 beds); 1 supply depot; 3 garages M. T.; 5 airmen's messes; 1 airmen's canteen; 1 civilian's quarters; 1 civilians' mess; 1 civilians' canteen; 1 recreation building; 2 N.C.O's quarters; 1 N.C.O's mess; 1 officers' quarters; 1 officers' mess; 1 25 yard M.G. range; 1 10-ft. stop butt; 1 watch office; 1 G.I.S. building; 1 H.Q. building; 1 drill hall; 1 camera obscura; 4 A.M.L. teachers; 3 turret instruction buildings; 4 spot light trainer buildings; 1 200-yard moving target range, M.T. gas storage, 1,000 gallons; A.C. gas storage, 20,000 gallons; grading sports fields; 1 sports pavilion; explosive storage, compass swinging base, power supply, heating equipment, services, etc. The buildings at the bombing range comprise 1 observation tower, 1 quadrant shelter, 1 raft target, 1 set spaish targets, 1 boat house, 1 boat dock, 1 garage M.T.

The estimate buildings and service requirements for one typical Service Flying Training School follow: 5 hangars 224 ft. by 160 ft.; 1 officers' quarters; 1 officers' mess; 1 N.C.O.'s mess; 2 N.C.O's quarters; 6 airmens' quarters; 2 airmens' messes; 1 civilians' quarters; 1 civilians' mess; 1 airmen's canteen; 1 recreation building; 1 guard house; 3 garages (M.T.); 1 supply depot; 1 hospital (34 beds); 1 25-yard M.G. range; 1 10-ft stop butt; 1 watch office; 1 compass swinging base (A.C. gas storage 20,000 gallons, M.T. gas storage 1,000 gallons, garage etc. R1 aerodrome, camera obscura); 4 A.M.L. teachers; 1 drill hall; grading sports fields; 1 G.I.S., explosive storage, power supply, service, roads, etc.

Preliminary Survey

"When it became apparent that a large number aerodromes would be required for the British Commonwealth plan," Mr. Power said, "the services of the airways branch of the Department of Transport were requisitioned. Its organization had just completed the development of the Trans-Canada Air Lines and experienced personnel was available to conduct a preliminary survey of the country for the purpose of selecting sites suitable for the economical development of the various types of schools.

"In the preliminary survey the officers of the Department of transport flew over all potential areas and picked out likely locations. These were then visited by them on the ground and a preliminary survey report prepared for each site. A representative of the Royal Canadian Air Force also visited each site and confirmed the suitability or otherwise, of the site for flying training.

"From a study of the preliminary survey reports by representatives of the Department of Transport and of the Royal Canadian Air Force, sites were tentatively selected for specific types of schools, distributed geographically throughout Canada as evenly as possible considering reasonable economical development and flying requirements.

"The potential sites for bombing and gunnery schools were restricted by the requirements of the bombing and gunnery range—eighteen miles by four miles, which has to be reserved for air firing and bombing practice.

"After sites had been tentatively allocated to schools the Department of Transport undertook a detailed survey. This involved preparation of a contour plan of the aerodrome and the surounding country to ascertain all details regarding the nature of soil, buildings in the locality and any factors which might affect its suitability as an air station. From this report engineers of the Department of Transport prepared a development plan for each site and estimated the cost of such development.

"This development plan with estimated cost was sent to the Royal Canadian Air Force where it was considered by the aerodrome development committee which consists of senior and responsible officers and officials of the departments of air and transport."

The Department of National Defence for Air plan, makes specifications for and supervises all construction of buildings, the contracts for which are arranged by the Department of Munitions and Supply.

Up to the present, the Department of National Defence for Air has allotted to the Department of Transport for its work on development, certain sums of money, in each case mentioned in the list hereunder. The work is either actually begun or will be commenced within the next three weeks.

In Memoriam

MRS. SPURGEON McARTHUR

The death of Mrs. Spurgeon McArthur occurred at the home of her daughter, Mrs. Arthur Mathews, of Elmsdale, at the age of 71 years. Mrs. McArthur was formerly Miss Jean Williams, of Elmsdale, where three brothers, Henry, Robert and Irving, and one sister May, still reside. She possessed a beautiful character, always kind and loving, thoughtful for others and ever engaged in loving deeds often beyond her strength. Since the death of her husband some years ago, she made her home with her two children, Jeanette, of Elmsdale, and Edgar, of North River, and other relatives of her family. She was a true mother of Israel and her lifelong service of love, and her constant love of her Saviour will be rewarded in the Great Beyond. Besides the above mentioned, there also survive three sisters, Caroline, Charlottetown, with whom she often lived; Bessie, of Wollaston, Mass.; Rachel, of Salem Depot, N.H. A very impressive and well-attended service was held in the church at Elmsdale, which was conducted by Rev. W. A. Paterson. His theme was The Forgotten Sheaf, which was left to the needy. Many sheaves had been woven together in her lifetime and then given away to those whom she loved and then forgotten. Interment was in the Elmsdale cemetery.

British Press Unswerving In Determination

LONDON, June 18—(Tuesday—(CP CABLE)—Britain's unswerving determination to continue to fight was voiced in editorials throughout the country echoing Prime Minister Churchill's declaration that the catastrophe in France "makes no difference."

The Daily Telegraph said that "Britain and the Dominions and the whole Empire find nothing in the changed situation which weakens their resolution to continue the struggle."

The Manchester Guardian declared that "we add the obstinacy of our nature to the resolution with which we have undertaken the struggle for freedom."

The Edinburgh Scotsman said: "For Great Britain and the British Empire there can be only one course—to fight until freedom and justice are re-established in Europe."

The Glasgow Herald asked for concentration on those things essential to Britain's safety—"security of these islands and mastery of the seas."

The Glasgow Bulletin said: "The only way by which we can save the life we know . . . is to fight for it."

The Northern Echo of Darlington said: "It must rest with us and probably with the United States to see that France overrun is not France overthrown."

Confidently the Daily Herald asserted that "we obey the command of our conscience . . we say: Britain fights on—to win!"

The Cardiff Western Mail said that the torch of freedom and human dignity has been thrust into Britain's hands. "We do not doubt for a moment," it said, "our strength to carry its pure flame unquenched through the storms ahead."

The Times warned that for Britain "the immediate future of hardship, desolation and loss is inescapable," but added: "When these things have been endured it is no less certain that Hitlerism will come to its Waterloo. Sea power is still the ultimate guarantee and still means that he who has undertaken to conquer England must attempt to conquer the world."

The French learned too late, said the Yorkshire Post, that war with Nazi Germany means "war with a nation which has welded its military, industrial and political weapons into a single, unprecedented striking force . . . we still have time—but not much time—to learn and act upon it ourselves."

A patrol leaders' camp will be held at Camp Fernwood this weekend. Capt. Ings, who is at present in Halifax, expects to be there to help direct proceedings. It is expected that something of a similar nature will be held in the Eastern end of the Island next week.

All scouts and cubs are reminded of the District Camps to be held this year in Prince and Queens Districts. The Cub camp for Prince District will be held at Camp Fernwood from June 29 to July 3, and the scout Camp for the same district from July 3 to July 12. The Cub camp for Queens District, which includes the remainder of the Island, will be held at Camp Buchan from July 12 to July 17, and the scout camp from Aug. 11 to Aug. 21.

We have begun to suspect that all Scout scribes must have been carried off by some unheard epidemic. At least very few troops seem interested enough in their own activities to let the public know what they are doing. The Scout Headquarters breathes a pious wish, "May the scribes soon recover!"

The third Charlottetown Troop closed its ordinary activities for the year by a patrol and troop hike last Monday. Each patrol was instructed to proceed one-half mile in any direction from Beach Grove Inn Bridge, and there to camp for the evening meal. Afterwards, the patrols proceeded to the camping-place of the Beaver, enjoyed a swim, and then gathered around the Council Fire for singing, jokes, stunts, etc. At the Council Fire Scout Donald MacLeod was invested and formally admitted to the Troop. Several scouts have practically completed their second class tests, and some are working on proficiency badges.

EGGNOGS MENU OF PRIZE LAMB

PORTLAND, Ore., June 18 —(CP) —Margaret Densmore's 11-week-old Rambouillet lamb won the bottle lamb and best-of-show ribbons at a livestock exhibit.

"I've never seen a lamb as fat or as well developed as this one, and I want it distinctly understood that her scrubbed ears and painted toenails had nothing to do with the award," the judge said. "What have you been feeding animal?"

Margaret explained that lamb, Chee-Chee, had five bo feedings of eggnog each day a substantial lunch of grah crackers.

On the way back to the fa Chee-Chee devoured the blue r bons.
