Garden Of 5,000,000 Plants

Today some 5,000,000 plants are classified and filed in the herbarium of the world's most famous botanical gardens now celebrating their centenary in the midst of the war. The Royal Botanical Gardens at Kew, covering 290 acres near Richmond on the Thames, sprang from a small private garden belonging to George the Third's mother which had already sent out expeditions for specimens to help agriculturists in the Empire's early days. One of these was the famous voyage of Captain Bligh who went off to the South Seas in search of the breadfruit tree. The expedition ended in the mutiny of the crew and Bligh's historic voyage of 3,600 miles in an open boat. The aim of the Royal Botanical Gardens, which first opened their gates to the public on April 12, 1841, was the Empire development of seeds and plants of economic importance. It was Kew, for example, which sent out to India cinchona plants grown from cuttings collected in South America for guanine to relieve malaria. Today the cinchona is grown in plantations owned by the Indian Government and factories extract its quinine and other alkaloids. A few years after the cinchona venture the introduction of rubber plants was initiated by the Government of India. Although some of the specimens then secured by Kew from South America were unsuited for plantation production, the rubber industry not only of Southern India but of Malaya and Ceylon has been the direct result of the enterprise then shown by the Royal Botanical Gardens of Kew. BIG FLOWER BORDER Chlengmat, second city of Thailand, is surrounded by a moat filled with lotus blossoms. Homing pigeons were used extensively by both sides during the First Great War.

Scene of Coronation Now Littered With Debris

Four years ago the King and Queen were crowned with brilliant, age-old ceremony in Westminster Abbey. Today, the Abbey's roof is open to the sky, war began. This section of the great hall, with its throne, on which Britain's kings have been crowned for 900 years, is littered with debris. Londoners, however, are thinking more of the record established by U.S. attack. The coronation chairs were removed from the Abbey in August, 1939, to a place of safety.
