TAKING CARE OF THE SEWING MACHINE

Most sewing machines strictly alone, fill the accumulation of dust and fluff and the lack of lubrication necessitates its complete overhauling.

Although this is always necessary from time to time, it would be required less frequently if a little regular attention were given to the machine.

The first sign of the need of cleaning is that the machine begins to run hardly, and very often in jerks. If the footplate is unscrewed, the places beneath will be found to be clogged with fluff and dust. A paraffin rag will be helpful in wiping away all the clogged-up oil, and tooth brush dipped in paraffin will also be found very useful.

In gilling the machine, which should be done regularly, reference should be made to the book of instructions provided at the time of purchase, and only a recognized machine oil may be used. In cold water a recently oiled machine will still run with difficulty. In such cases the usual remedy is to stand the sewing machine near a fire for a little while in order that the heat may make the lubricant run a little.

The hand of treadle machine very often becomes loose, but before cutting it or buying a new one try the effect of rubbing in castor oil. After the oil is on the band turn the handle of the machine vigorously for a minute or two. This shrinks the band in nearly all cases. Tension should be adjusted in accordance with the various materials that are being worked, so that the stitch is firm, but not tight. But tension is not always at fault if the stitch is imperfect.
