"We better make a front-page story of this wedding," remarked the editor.

"Why?" asked the society reporter in surprise.

"That may be," he replied, "but this is the first account of a wedding you have turned in for ages that hasn't had as a last line, 'They will reside with the bride's parents.'" - Cincinnati Enquirer.

Why Do Women Marry? Dorothy Dix Finds Reasons Not Always Romantic

Why are Girls so Anxious to Marry? — Because Every Woman is an Incurable Optimist When it Comes to Marriage, or Because She is Lazy, Lonely, Bored or Afraid to be an Old Maid

A correspondent asks: "Why are girls so anxious to marry?" Oh, the cosmic urge. The instinctive desire for husband and children and home. To be wife and mother and home-maker. That is the career that Nature destined woman for, and she won't be happy until she achieves it.

Goodness knows, there is nothing so alluring in marriage, as she sees it exemplified in the experience of her mother and her sisters and her cousins and her aunts, to make her sprain a limb in hastening to the altar. She doesn't see them basking in a romantic Paradise with nothing to do but to bill and coo and listen to an impassioned lover tell them how beautiful and wonderful they are and sing the saga of their charms and virtues.

She has seen that Mame, who used to be the office beauty, has lost her good looks since she got married and has to do her own cooking and baby-tending. That Sally, who always dressed like a manikin, is wearing hand-me-downs now that she is married to Tom, who isn't so hot as a money-maker.

Looking at the results of marriage on women, they cannot see that the girls they know, who have given up good jobs for a husband, have made such a killing. Yet still they all want to try it because every woman is an incurable optimist where love is concerned.

She is always perfectly sure that her marriage will be an ideal mating; that her husband will always remain tender and true and be a go-getter; that her children will be blue-eyed angels with golden curls; that her home will run itself without work or worry.

Other girls marry because they are lazy and they feel that any sort of meal ticket is preferable to having to earn their own bread and butter. They are tired of punching the time clock and want to be in bed in the morning, and to spend their days on a couch nibbling chocolates and reading sloppy novels, instead of standing behind a counter or pounding a typewriter.

Of course, the girl who marries because she is tired of working, as she puts it, generally finds that she has jumped out of the frying pan into the fire; that there is no eight-hour day in the home, and that performing upon the kitchen range and the washbub is far more arduous and exhausting than any opus she ever executed on a mahogany desk.

Other girls marry because they are afraid of being lonely. Girls are particularly likely to do this when they get around 30. Most of their contemporaries are married and settled. They feel their youth slipping away and know that their chances of getting a husband are diminishing.

happy and contented as they are, and marriage of itself has no particular attraction for them.

But suddenly they get into a blind panic of fear of the future. They picture to themselves a desolate and companionless old age, with no one to care for them, no one to cherish them, and, while they are in this funk they will marry the old beau who bores them to tears and whom they have refused a hundred times, or a widower with seven small children who will carry the life out of them, or a ne'er-do-well that they will have to work and support.

Many girls marry because they are bored. They want the thrill and excitement of a big wedding and the fun of setting up a new home and furnishing it to their own taste. Many rich girls marry for an occupation. They are sick and tired of trying to amuse themselves and they want to set about the real business of life and have something to do that is constructive and worthwhile.

Innumerable girls marry to escape being old maids. Somehow, they seem to think that it is a disgrace never to have had a husband. That it shows they are lacking in charms or attractions. So terrible do they regard this fate that they are willing to make any sacrifice and put up with any sort of a misfit husband and to keep from being spinsters.

Oh, girls marry for many reasons besides love. Which perhaps explains why there is so much marital unhappiness and so many divorces. DOROTHY DIX.

Are You Making A Morning Smile

Before the snow comes or as soon as you can manage it, make an excursion into the woods for tiny seedling evergreens, fir and fir balsam or a wee pine tree or two, for one of the dish gardens that are so interesting and so much the thing to have" as one friend put it.

There is no end to the material and—let me whisper—if you cannot afford a wonderful and expensive dish, you can pick up shallow bowls or kitchen pans and if their color does not suit you, paint them. The bowl itself should really be inconspicuous if your miniature garden is to show up well. Use sand and a little leaf mould for the shallow planting and plan a little hill and maybe a tiny valley with a pool or a narrow river like lake crossed by the bridges you can easily make from fine twigs if you have none of the Japanese ones. Once you begin you will find yourself looking round for odd little Japanese or Chinese figures and houses to add interest. They come in sets, but if you cannot find them, you can do as one clever little woman did, model figures out of putty, and when they are dry, paint them in gay colors.

A little patty pan with gravel and sand in the bottom makes a fine lake, the edges of which can be hidden by more gravel and sand or by moss or little plants.

Perhaps a search in your garden will show you seedling iris that may be used for bulbuses or palms as your plan may call for.

Many of the rock garden plants work in well. Tiny rosettes of the small house leeks are fine for a desert garden and then you can also utilize the little cactus. Only be-

For The Cook

This is a slight variation of the more usual creamed lobster, and consider it an improvement.

4 tablespoons butter. 4 tablespoons flour. 1 teaspoon salt. 1/2 teaspoon white pepper. 2 cups milk. 1 egg yolk. Melt the butter and blend the flour into it smoothly. Add the seasonings and very slowly stir in the milk. Cook, stirring constantly, until the sauce is smoothly thickened. Immediately before serving pour the hot sauce into the beaten egg yolk. Pour the sauce, piping hot over the unheated lobster that has been put on the hot buttered toast.

Other Fish Creamed salmon or tuna fish an admirable substitute for this dish if preferred to lobster, and in either case the flaked fish, freed from all skin and bone, is added to the hot sauce.

The movie manager was furious. "What's the matter?" asked his assistant. "Is anything wrong?" "Anything wrong!" he snorted. "Why, you've advertised for next week: 'Smiling Eyes—with a strong cast!'" —Tit-Bits.

Make and Keep Children Well—As Mothers Know

ASHES of ROSES A Romance of Today By Joanna Cannan

Fay Bennett was a quick worker, too quick to be accurate, so nervous Mr. Errans said. Twice that morning she brought her pages of typescript to Geoffrey's table. The first time she said nothing, and Geoffrey said nothing either because in the overwhelming emotion which her proximity caused him, he was too confused to think of anything to say. The second time he had a remark ready. He said, "I'm not catching you up at all, I'm only at 'D'." Her face lit up at once and she said, "Oh well, you'll get quicker. I expect it feels strange at first." Geoffrey thought that that was very sweet and kind of her. He was not at all conceited. He knew that some people thought him good-looking, but his looks were not of a type which he himself admired, and through all his athletic successes his own light heartedness had preserved his values—a game was still only a game. It did not occur to him, therefore, that this lovely girl had any reason to feel the slightest interest in him.

Was So Short of Breath Could Not Lie Down to Sleep

Mrs. P. J. Chernoff, Shoreacres, B.C., writes: "I had been so troubled with shortness of breath I could not lie down to sleep. I couldn't do any hard work, or climb the stairs, and had nervous and smothering feelings, and became very weak. I tried all kinds of medicine, but could get no relief until after I had taken three boxes of MILBURN'S HEART NERVE PILLS. I have felt better in every way."

awoke in him a sudden, wild desire, a desire to fight battles and kill dragons, the protective instinct of the young male. Oh, for some misadventure, a fire, a flood, a madman, a falling crane anything so that he might rescue her!

"I think it looks ever so nice." She raised her eyes. Again he felt that odd sensation of losing himself in them.

Mr. Errans came across the room to his table. Fay put down the index card and went away.

"Some go out to lunch from twelve to one, Mr. Geoffrey," said Mr. Errans. "And some from one till two. Which would you prefer?" "Whichever would suit you best," replied Geoffrey, very properly.

"I think on the whole, one till two. Bain, Turner, Miss Carter and the boy go then. And it would be more convenient in case Mr. Gilmore wanted you to lunch with him."

"All right," said Geoffrey. A few minutes later, he regretted that arrangement, for Fay came down the room and went up to the dark, merry girl and tugged at her sleeve. Miss Evers got down from her stool and the two went off together. Had he been going out to lunch at the same time, at least he might have had the chance of speaking to them on the stairs. As it was, they were back in the office before the stroke of one, and though Fay passed his table, she did not look at him.

Geoffrey went to an eating house which his father had recommended to him. It was good enough of its kind, but it seemed sordid stifling, repulsive, on that scorching August day. The smell of meat and the heat of crowded humanity met Geoffrey on the threshold and disgusted him. He hung up his hat and sat down in a vacant place at a table near the door. The other men who were sitting at the table looked up at him as they masticated, and then down at their food again. They were all four small, thin men with anxious faces and thinning hair.

Geoffrey ordered cold mutton and sat watching the flies crawling over the sugar and the spots of gravy on the tablecloth until it came. Then he found that he did not like the look of it. He remembered the large careless meals that he had eaten at school, and this surprised him. Miss Evers went to the bank and packed herself into a tube train. It was unbelievably hot in the crowded smoking compartment; he had to stand, and he could not remember that he had ever felt so tired. He wondered if that poor little girl was going home in a train like this, and the thought horrified him. The world had always seemed to him a beautiful and a pleasant place, but he saw now that that wasn't that there was something terribly wrong with it since a girl like Fay had to work in a dingy office and go up and down to work in trains like this, and be crushed and jostled and given orders, and be as tired as he was now.

Miss Carter came over to Geoffrey and asked him how he liked his tea. She was a very tall angular woman of twenty-nine or thirty with a face that was much younger and a manner that was much older than her years. She blushed when she spoke to Geoffrey. Geoffrey said that he liked it as it came and no sugar, please, and presently Miss Evers brought it to him. The three girls stood round him with their heads together, giggling. Mr. Errans walked across to Geoffrey. He said that it had
