SANDRA THE JEALOUS
By Jane Phelps

SANDRA REALIZES THAT SHE HAS DEVELOPED

Rose Kemp's very real troubles made my imaginary ones disappear for a time. When I was tempted to fret, or to give way to my jealousy, I thought of her, her spoiled life, would steady me. Then too as Junior grew older, I was occupied most of the time. My husband's social position demanded that we entertain a good deal, and of course we were entertained as well. Now he left all the details to me, instead of attending to them himself, with Mrs. Gray's assistance.

"You have developed into a wonderful hostess, Sandra," he said after a large dinner we gave. Everything had gone off smoothly, and I too was rather proud of my success.

"I am delighted if you were pleased," I said quietly. Little he knew how I longed for something more than his calm praise which he might have given to anyone who had pleased him.

"You can be delighted, then, for I was very pleased. Even Leverage, your bete noir, complimented you. Said you were great."

"I am much obliged to Mr. Leverage. Considering that he knows so much about such things, it was quite a compliment." We both laughed at my sarcasm, and nothing more was said. But long after Everett had left for the office, I stood at this window, where I had waved good-bye to him, and wished he would just once forget to praise so calmly; and love me as he had Leola.

window, where I had waved good-bye to him, and wished he would just once forget to praise so calmly; and love me as he had Leola.

"He never will. He'll never say those things to me," I murmured as I turned away, that note I had found so long ago still vividly in my mind. Irma Barton was back. We had given her a dinner, and she had returned the compliment. She seemed very happy, and looked ten years younger—so Everett said.

We made up a little bridge club, playing once a week, just we four. As I grew to know Irma, I saw how I had wronged her, in supposing she would be guilty of attempting to take Everett from me. She was the soul of honor. She never quibbled even when society women in general would perhaps have done so. And she was charming to me.

"You have made Everett over," she said once. "I rather thought you would. He is very much more entertaining than he used to be. A young wife was the best thing in the world for him. But tell me, didn't he have a few gray hairs when I was married? I had a notion he had"—then, as she saw my expression, "don't tell me he has dyed them! That would be too wonderful, considering his expressed aversion towards women who do such things."

"You mustn't mention it to him; he is awfully sensitive over it," I told her, "and claims he did it for my sake—so people would not think him my grandfather."

She laughed heartily, then said: "If I had told I promised I won't! But, Sandra, he must be very much in love with you; very anxious to keep your affection, for him to do a thing like that—it is so foreign to him. I think you should feel flattered."

"He doesn't seem old to me now." I recalled the day so long ago when I had talked with Irma of Leola, and how I had wished I were older, more like her. Now, she didn't seem so much older, or else it was because I had lost some of my own childishness.

"No, he wouldn't! You have grown along with him, Sandra. You are so wonderfully improved. You don't mind my saying so, do you? And Everett is terribly proud of you. He shows it in everything he says and does."

"I would rather he loved me more and was less proud," trembled on my tongue, but I caught myself in time, and said nothing about the longing I still had to KNOW, of myself, that my husband loved me as he was capable of loving—as he had loved my predecessor.

"He has tried hard enough to make something of me," I replied with a laugh. "It would be too bad if he hadn't accomplished something."

"Do not undervalue yourself. You are a very charming little woman. I am so happy myself, that I can afford to be generous and tell other women the truth."

Tomorrow—Sandra is Overwhelmed By A New Thought.
