A Morning Smile

They were in a very dark corner of the hall. "Give me a kiss," he pleaded. No answer. He asked four times and got no answer.

You love to watch him EAT!

It gives you a real thrill, to see your youngster dip lustily into the cereal bowl. You know he's doing his part toward building growth and health.

So give him a bowl of Kellogg's Rice Krispies and milk. Breakfast, lunch or supper—watch him eat! Rice Krispies fascinate children.

The Tactful Woman Makes the Kind of Wife Whose Price is Above Rubies; of Mother Whose Children Rise up to Call Her Blessed; of Friend Whom We Bless for Being Intimate Without Becoming Inquisitive

One of the chief virtues of women is tact. A tactful and gracious woman is worth her weight in gold wherever you may find her, for hers is the magic that smooths down the ruffled feathers of the overly sensitive, that sidesteps our prejudices instead of bumping into them, and that generally sidespanders the rough edges of life.

The tactful woman makes the kind of wife whose price is above rubies. In her home the domestic machinery never creaks and groans and shrieks aloud. It moves noiselessly and frictionlessly on oiled ball-bearings.

Being of different sexes, coming of a different heredity, having been brought up in a different environment, there are inevitably many subjects that she and her husband must see from a different viewpoint and concerning which they have different opinions.

The tactful woman studies her man and, in the parlance of her day, gets his number, and so knows how to work him. If he has the head-of-the-house complex and likes to be deferred to and considered, she makes the graceful gesture of asking his advice, which pleases him so much that he never notices whether she takes it or not.

She knows that when a man is tired and hungry it is no time to tell him bad news or ask for money. And so she waits until he is rested and fed and soothed before she imparts the information that mother is coming on a nice long visit, or gives him the bill for her new hats.

The tactful wife keeps her husband always on his toes to live up to her expectation of him, because she praises his good qualities and makes him believe that whatever a dull and unappreciative world may think of him, she thinks him a wonder, and he has to do wonders to justify her faith in him.

Furthermore, the tactful wife helps her husband by making friends for him. Many a business deal goes blooey because an arrogant woman snubs some little insignificant woman whose husband happens to be the kingpin in the deal.

They buy their groceries of Mr. A., or they send for Dr. B. when they are sick, or they have their teeth fixed by Dr. C. Just because Mesdames A., B. and C. are always so perfectly charming and delightful, and say such pleasant things to them when they meet that they boost their games.

And, on the other hand, an untactful wife is invariably her husband's undoing, because when she irritates people she drives his clients and customers away from him. Nobody is going out of his or her way to patronize the husband of a woman who is snippy or snobbish or sarcastic and disagreeable, or who is like a bull in a china shop and always says to you something that hurts like pressing on a sore spot.

The tactful woman is a mother whose children rise up and bless her to the last day of their lives. They never look back upon a childhood in which they are kept in subjection by her. They never think of their mother as an incarnate "don't," or as a spoilsport who could be counted on beforehand to veto everything they wanted to do.

The tactful wife and mother never has any trouble keeping her husband and children at home. You can't drive them away from the one place in the world where there is peace and comfort and where their fur is always rubbed the right way.

The tactful woman is the friend we grapple to our souls with hopes of steel because she understands the fine art of being intimate without being inquisitive. She is interested in everything we do, but she does not pry into our private affairs, nor seek to poke her nose into our holy of holies. She listens with sympathy to what we have to tell her, but she asks no questions. She is always willing to help, but she does not feel that it gives her the right to boss us. And because she loves us she does not feel that she has the privilege of monopolizing us.

Tact and graciousness. They are the virtues of queens. What a pity that women do not cultivate them more, for they are the magic talismans that opens every door for a woman and will do more to insure her happiness and success than anything else in the world.

Severe Headaches Pimples on Face

Miss Marie L. C. Blackwell, Gunn, Ala., writes: "For two years I suffer from severe headaches, and pimples on my face. My headaches seemed incurable, and I thought the pimples would never disappear."

A friend recommended Burdock Blood Bitters, and on trying a bottle I found the headaches disappear, and I am not bothered any more with the pimples."

The House of Dreams-Come-True By Margaret Fedler (Continued) "Tell me now!" "Non, non! Win her your own way. Only, if you do not succeed, if Monsieur Tormarin wins her—why, then, come to visit me at Chateau Varigny."

That night a letter written in the Comtesse de Varigny's flowing hand writing sped on its way to France. "Matters work towards completion," it ran. "My visit here has chanced been a propos. There is another would-be lover besides Blaise Tormarin. I have urged him to win her if he can, for if I have not wrongly estimated Monsieur Tormarin—and I do not think I have—he is the type to become more deeply in love and less able to master his feelings if he realizes that he has a rival. At present he refrains from declaring himself. The opposition of a rival will probably drive him into a declaration very speedily. When the God sees the bone a-pout to be taken from him—he snaps so I encavour this red-headed lion of a man, Monsieur Burke, to pursue his affaire due coeur with vigor. For if Blaise Tormarin becomes actually betrothed to Mademoiselle Peterson, it will make his punishment the more complete. I pray the God of Justice that it may not now be long delayed!"

CHAPTER XXV ARRANGED BY TELEPHONE The visit to London, if it had not been prolific in the results which Lady Anne had hoped for, had at least accomplished certain things. It had acted as a brake upon the swiftly turning wheels of two lives precariously poised at the top of that steep hill of which no traveler can see the end, but which very surely leads to heartbreak and disaster, and had sufficed, as Jean had suggested that it might to restore Nick to a more normal and temperate state of mind.

He and Claire had passed a long hour alone together the day after his return to Staple, and now that the first violent reaction, the first instinctive impulse of unbearable revolt from Sir Adrian's spying and brutality had spent itself, they had agreed to shoulder once more the burden Fate had laid upon them, to fight on again, just holding fast to the simple knowledge of their love for one another and leaving the ultimate issue to that great, unfathomable Player who "hither and thither moves, and mates, and slays," not with the shadowed vision of our finite eyes but with the insight of eternity.

Apparently he had not made a confidant of his sister over the matter, for it was without the least indication of a back thought of any kind that she approached Jean on the subject of spending a few days with herself and Geoffrey at their bungalow on the Moor. "Geoff and I are going for a week's blow on Dartmoor, just by way of a 'pick-me-up.' Come with us, Jean; it will do you good after stuffy old London—blow the cobwebs away!" But here, as least, Jean felt that discretion was the better part of valor. It was true that Burke appeared fairly amenable to reason just at present, but in the informal companionship of daily life in a moorland bungalow it was more than probable that he would become less manageable. And she had no desire for a repetition of that scene in the inn parlour.

Therefore, although the Moor, with its great stretches of gold and purple, its fragrant, healthy breath and its enfolding silences, appealed to her in a way in which nothing else on earth seemed quite to appeal, pulling at her heartstrings as most as the nostalgia for home and country pulls at the heartstrings of a wanderer, she returned a regretful negative to Judith's invitation. So Burke and Mrs. Craig packed up and departed to Three Fir Bungalow without her, and life at Staple resumed the even tenor of its way.

The weather was glorious, the long, hot summer days melting into balmy nights when the hills and dales amid which the old house was set were bathed in moonlight mystery—transmuted into a wonderland of phantasy, cavernous with shadow where undreamed-of dragons lurked, lambent with opalescent fields of splendour where vipers the glimmer of half-visions of some ethereal fairy castle.

More than once Jean's thoughts turned wistfully towards the Moor which she had so longed to see by moonlight—Judith's "holy of holies that God must have made for His spirits"—and she felt disposed to blame herself for the robust attack of caution which had impelled her to refuse the invitation to the bungalow.

"One loses half the best things in life by being afraid," she told herself petulantly. "And a second chance to take them doesn't come!" She felt almost tempted to write to Judith and propose that she should join her at the bungalow for a few days after all if she still had room for her. And then, as is often the way of things just when we are contemplating taking the management of affairs into our own hands, the second chance offered itself without any directing impulse on Jean's part.

The telephone bell rang, and Jean, who was expecting an answer to an important message she had phoned through on Lady Anne's behalf, hastened to answer it. Very much to her surprise she found that it was Burke who was speaking at the other end of the wire.

"Is that you, Geoffrey?" she exclaimed in astonishment. "I didn't know your bungalow was on the telephone, though you were miles from anywhere!" "It isn't. And we are," came back Burke's voice. From a certain quality it she knew that he was smiling. "I'm in Okehampton, phoning from a pal's house. I've a message for you from Judy."

"Ye-es?" intoned Jean enquiringly. "She wants you to come up tomorrow, just for one night. It'll be a full moon and she says you will be a hanker to see the Moor by moonlight. Have you?" "Yes, oh yes!" with enthusiasm. "Though so, it certainly does look topping. Quite worth seeing. Well, look her, Judy's got a party of friends, down from town, who are coming over to us from the South Devon side—going to drive up and stay the night, and the idea is to do a moonlight scramble up on to the top of one of the tors after supper. Are you game?"
