TOO MUCH DAYLIGHT SAVING

Farmer Hayseed was an old-fashioned farmer. He firmly believed in that quaint and worn-out saying, "Early to bed, early to rise—"

He couldn't get along at all with the modern type of farmhand. So, after thinking matters over, Hayseed decided to reform.

After many trials he secured a strapping big fellow and resolved to keep that hand at any cost. Accordingly, on the first morning,he waited until 4 o'clock before sounding the breakfast call.

"Get out of there quick if you want anything to eat!"

"Thanks, very much" growled the new hand, "but I never eat anything just before going to sleep."

An Adventure In Years

By CAROLYN BEECHER

Chapter X.

The next day was showery and kept everybody indoors. Everybody was uncomfortable. The following day Sonia was busy helping the maid prepare for their dinner guests. The portrait must not be negected—so Beverly maintained, as Ned and he went off alone on their sailing trip. Sonia sighed as she saw them go, but her duties as hostess would not allow her to neglect this dinner to the girl she had been told might prove a genial playfellow for Ned.

All the long afternoon she drew mind pictures of what this girl looked like. She must be fat and short like the father. erhaps, too, her features were heavy like his. She had youth, and youth is never ugly.

She dressed with more than her usual care. She wore a dress of palest green, soft as the foam on the whitecaps of the day before. A bandeaux held her hair closely to her head. She wore no other ornament. Jewels always make a woman look old. And she had determined to use all the arts of the toilet to be young this night.

At just seven o'clock they came.

"My daughter, Dora, Mrs. Strong," Sonia heard, and mechanically took the hand outstretched to her. Mechanically her lips moved in the usual stilted words of welcome. She scarcely knew when Beverly drew Ned forward and presented him.

Was this dainty fairy-like creature the short fat girl she had pictured as Delong's daughter? Her golden hair fell in soft curls about her forehead and in her neck. Her eyes were deep blue, almost violet, her mouth a rosebud. She was short, almost tiny, but not fat. Indeed she was so slight as to give an impression of frailness. Yet Sonia knew she was neither frail nor a weakling in any respect. The rosebud mouth showed determination, the rounded chin had not the slightest hint of weakness.

"Oh, yes I love to sail! I sail my own boat. I will take you out whenever you ike," she was saying to Ned, who evidently had been talking of his afternoon's sail.

"That's fine!" His reply came distinctly to Sonia, although she was trying to appear interested in what Mr. Delong was saying.

"She's a tomboy, Mr. Campbell" Her father turned to them. I'm always expecting she will be brought home on a stretcher."

"Nonsense, dad!" What a reputation you are giving me-" But it developed that she rode, hunted, paddled a canoe, and did all the other things the up-to-date college girl does.

Sonia's heart sank. What right had she, tied to another man to be jealous of this girl, so lovely, and so alive? A fitting playfellow for Ned. She noticed them standing close together, his dark head, her bright one. He was laughing at something she had said, but as she looked he turned and his eyes met hers. There was something flashed into them when he looked that brought comfort, peace to her. It was almost as if he had said:

"She's cunning, like a little kitten. But it is not you."

Sonia had further comfort when Mr. Delong said:

"Your husband tells me you have been married eight years. Were you in the cradle? One would certainly think he robbed the schoolroom. You look scarcely older than Dora."

"You don't either," Ned whispered. "The old guy tells the truth."

But Sonia knew. What woman doesn't? And, knowing,she watched every look, every word that this girl gave to Ned She tried to pretend to herself that it was for his good. That she stood in the place of a mother to him. But all the time she knew it was not motherly anxiety—that it was crass primitive, jealousy that made her blood hot, her heart beat.

Beverly was all suave desire to please his guests. Never had he been more charming and with less reason, so Sonia thought. Never had she denied his attraction when he desired to exert it. To her, who knew, it was repellant, but to those to whom he was simply an acquaintance he was all that was desirable. A fascinating man.

After dinner they had some music. Again was Sonia surprised. Dora Deong was a finished musician. It seemed it was her father's passion—this squat fat man was a music lover. She played and sang for them, making no excuses, doing it as if it were a pleasure to herself as well as to them.

Ned had not appeared particularly impressed. Yet how could he help but admire this dainty creature, all blonde loveliness and youth? Sonia saw her husband's eyes follow hers as they rested a moment on Dora Delong, then almost unconsciously turned toward Ned. A smile rested on Strong's lips, but there was a cynical look in his eyes belying the smile.

Dora, it seemed, was also a poor bridge player, when come one proposed the game.

"It seems such a waste of time to sit in a hot room playing cards when all out doors is waiting for one," she said when asked about her game.

"You are an out-door girl,then?" Strong asked.

"Indeed, I am—an out-and-out fresh air fiend My friends call me a crank, but that doesn't matter I love out doors, even when it storms."

"So do I," broke in Ned and for the first time that evening Sonia thought he looked at their guest with interest
