"Hit Parade Of 1941" At Capitol

"Hit Parade of 1941" breezed into the Capitol Theatre yesterday and left a wake of enthusiasm among local song-and-dance lovers who witnessed the local premiere. The musical presents an all-star cast, including Kenny Baker, Frances Langford, Hugh Herbert, Mary Boland, Pat V. and Phil Silvers, in one continuous laugh-out-loud and jam session, combining spritely tunes and colorful dances with an exciting plot which could not fail to captivate the most critical audience.

Borran Minevitch and his Rascals, those harmonica maniacs, fill a prominent spot in the bill, as do "Six Pins and a Miss." The intrepid Sterling Holloway scores in his comedy characterization of the philosophical soda jerk, and Barnett Parker and Donald McBride add to the general merry-making.

The story deals with the tribulations of Kenny Baker and Hugh Herbert, first as proprietors of an insolvent antique shop, and then of an insolvent radio station, only to learn that the advent of television will entail a gigantic expense in erecting a station for sight as well as sound.

Matters go from bad to worse, but Miss Langford, aided and abetted by the Misses Kelly and Miller, ultimately save the day and peace and prosperity are restored to Station WPC.

BREAST FEEDING

"You must drink a pint of porter 3 times a day," said the doctor-mother of last century to her son's wife soon expecting her first baby. It always drank it and my nurse never failed. "I know that I can never drink the nasty stuff," said the young wife; "the very thought of it sickens me; I'd rather take castor oil."

We have learned something in the interval. One of these things is that porter, beer and other alcoholic are not necessary for the nursing mother. What she requires is good ordinary food, plenty of sleep, a woman spared for a month, in 99 cases out of a hundred, have plenty of nurse for her baby.

There is an impression among many persons that the milk-producing ability is much less in elderly mothers particularly with the first baby. The best type of food is cow's milk diluted with water in proportion to age, with the addition of corn syrup or sugar. From six months onward, the vegetable and cereal may be given. Diluted orange or tomato juice may be given after the 3rd month. Cod-liver oil, a teaspoonful before each of 3 meals, may be given after the second month. It must be remembered that the growth of a baby in the first year of life is phenomenal. In this period the child requires very much more food than after one year when the growth is not so great.

One Million Tablets To Fight Pneumonia

GIFT TO GREECE ACCEPTED BY DUCHESS OF KENT

The Duchess of Kent received at the Mansion House recently a gift of drugs to the value of $ 5,000 from the Lord Mayor's Greek Relief Fund. The gift, which was made by Messrs. May and Baker, consisted of 1,000,000 tablets of the drug M. & B 693 used in the treatment of pneumonia and other diseases.

The Lord Mayor told the Duchess of Kent that a few days ago the British Ministry in Athens sent an urgent telegram to London asking for a supply of the tablets and that £1,000 of the funds collected for the relief of Greece and other districts in Greece arising from the war should be used to combat the pneumonia at present prevalent.

The directors of Messrs. May and Baker were approached and generously offered to present 1,000,000 tablets to the value of $5,000 free of cost to the Fund. It was, he said, a great and humanitarian gesture to the sick people of our heroic ally.

Society was read by the secretary recognizing receipt of 10 caskets, e.g. 4 pairs mitts; 8 pair socks; 2 helmets; 2 wristlets; 1 pair bed sox, which have been knitted by the Institute to date. A vote of thanks was tendered Miss Isabel Robertson for her good work in the Institute. Mrs. Joseph Cullen kindly invited the members to her home for the next meeting which will take place Wednesday April 10. Roll call to be answered with "jokes". The meeting closed with the National Anthem, after which a delicious lunch was served by the hostess and a pleasant hour spent.

Mrs. Harry Trainor, Baldwin Road, was a visitor to Morell recently, the guest of her sister-in-law, Mrs. Louis Connolly.

CHAPTER XXV

HARD WORK AND SOFT HANDS

"Dear Madam, in answer to your advertisement for a companion, help, though I have had no experience of house work, I would be very willing, etc. etc."

Lorna stayed in her boarding-house and waited for replies to half-a-dozen such letters she wrote in response to newspaper inquiries. Some received no answer, some a note to the effect that a girl with such experience would be unsuitable.

But the upshot of it was that at the end of ten days she found herself in a small wooden box of a house fifteen miles out of Wellington, by a main road, in an expanse of flat paddocks surrounded by wire fences. She was working for a stout, hard-faced woman with false hair and small eyes; a thin, hen-pecked man, and three hatchet-faced sons who gazed avidly at Lorna behind their mother's back.

There she learned, with difficulty and many mistakes, what it is to rise at five a.m. to clean grates, wash dishes, scrub sinks and floors, chop wood, carry coal, light fires, prepare meals, cook them, serve them and wash dishes again. She galled her experience of house work, she was forced into contact with the smells, clumsiness, small interest, and coarse conversation of five very unimpressive people. Not the least disconcerting was their uneasy suspicion of herself, as someone obviously "different."

She worked in the house from five in the morning until seven at night to the sound of a wireless, which blared all the time, and the accompaniment of such remarks from her employer as:

"Seems to me its funny some people should think themselves fit to help in the country when they can't even milk!" And: "You mean ter say you don't know how to make scones?" My goodness, what do you know?"

Friendlier moments—when the avid eyes were out of the house, were filled with a stream of virulent gossip about the neighbours.

Had Lorna known the custom of her position would have given her plenty of time off it she had decried it. Not demanded, it was really withheld. She could not have endured the first nerve-shattering week at all if it had not had no haunted her.

"Other girls do this job easily enough. If I can't do it, everything Hawkesford said about me is true!" So she stuck to it, until she could work quickly, without mistakes, until she was indifferent to scolding looks and comments; until her hands were ingrained with dirt, her soft nails were worn to the quick, and she had lost half a stone in weight.

At the end of six weeks she did not see why she should endure it any longer, and she left.

After that she found a job at a Wellington employment agency, and went north to Hawkes Bay, to look after a small boy whose mother was in a nursing home.

Armed with primers in arithmetic and spelling, she took her lonely journey to her post, and found a sheep station homestead such as she had dreamed about. There was the white painted house in a charming garden sheltered by pines and gums. The men rode out every morning on horses, the dogs barked on their chains beneath the great gum trees. All round were chaotic yellow hills, rolling like a grassy sea to the ramparts of the mountains.

Lorna looked after the little boy and found she could teach him successfully. There it was impossible to conceal who she was, and from hints that were dropped she gathered that they knew of the frightful accident to her fiancé in the South Island. Everyone was very kind to her.

She began to be taught how to milk cows, and found it easy enough. The elder son of the house even gave her a lesson in wool shearing.

"You have the best life in the world here!" Lorna told them all. She believed, it yet she felt so sad. While she was there she met someone she knew, a Colonel Cambridge, one of the men who had met on the inquiry into Richard's death.

He came up with the station-owner to spend a week-end. He recognized Lorna, and looked at her in astonishment. She felt that some explanation was needed, and when she happened to be alone with him on the homestead sun-porch, she said:

"I suppose you thought I had gone home with my father, Colonel Cambridge."

"Yes, as a matter of fact, I did, Miss Marrs," he admitted.

"You must be surprised to see me here in this job. But I felt I would rather stay out here for a while, after what happened."

"Yes," he said. "Quite."

A slight shadow which fell on his face made her add diffidently:

"I'm very silent about anything which might be considered an of-
