A Polish-American flyer, Hausner was rescued from his drifting plane in the Atlantic Ocean when he fell in an attempted American-to-Poland flight in 1932. He planned to try a Detroit-to-Warsaw flight next month.

NEW YORK, May 19—I met Lawrence in 1918, when he came to England for the peace conference. He came with Amir Faisal, who was representing his father, King Hussein of the Hedjaz. That was the beginning of an association between us which lasted throughout the rest of his life.

He came to London to spend the day with me less than two months ago.

Although we had corresponded frequently, I had not seen him since he finished his magnificent translation of the Odyssey in 1932. I got him to start this in 1927. It was the beginning of the most fruitful translation.

A week before he came to see me in London, I had gone to visit him at his cottage in Dorset. His neighbors told me photographers and reporters had besieged him for interviews and notes, which he refused to grant. When he came to see me in London he told me that he had had no peace since leaving the army service.

I asked him on that visit about his plans, and it now seems tragic to recall that he answered, "Well I figure that I have 20 good years of life ahead of me, and I'm going to carry on as leader of my English countrymen on my hike."

He expressed for years an inexplicable love of England.

In 1927 he wrote me from Karachi, India: "I hate the East. It holds bad memories for me, and I begrudge every day that I spend away from England, where, only, I feel at home."

"This is my 15th year abroad, but I had to ask the airforce to put me on foreign service, for the publicity unavoidable in connection with the 'Beetle' has been ravaging here and my presence would have rendered my life intolerable and my presence a cursed nuisance to my commanding officer in any camp in England."

So I am excited till the fuses about my book has died down in the press.

I proposed in London that he come to America, to visit me and see some of the country.

He said: "No, I haven't time. There's too much of England I want to see before I die. You who dash about England in motorcars never get to know the beauty and peace on the byways. In them I shall lose my bad memories of the East."

I think that his death is an incalculable loss, but I believe that in crisis in the East, which he believed imminent, he would have been the man of the hour.

He spoke to me at great length of his fear that the Italian-Abyssinian trouble might precipitate a great religious war. He felt that that would be far more dangerous

During the course of this week Mr. Bennett will meet all his supporters in caucus, and his immediate associates in Cabinet Council. He will lay before them the situation with respect to his health and offer to carry on as leader if his first attempt to resume work do not result in any lessening of his restored vigor.

Decision as to leadership will depend upon the Prime Minister's physical endurance, and the opinions of his followers as to whether or not they should permit Mr. Bennett to chance a second breakdown that might result in permanent injury to his health.

OTTAWA, May 19—Questions of far reaching importance politically and economically will be decided during the final drive of the pre-election Parliamentary session which resumes tomorrow.

Politically the outstanding feature will be the decision with respect to leadership of the government party. Economic measures to be considered include the legislation implementing the report of the mass buying commission, a housing scheme, employment efforts, and the proposed reciprocal trade agreement with United States.

Whether Mr. Bennett will follow the advice of his medical advisers and seek that rest, at once, or attempt the burdensome tasks of government and a general election campaign remains to be decided.

During the course of this week Mr. Bennett will meet all his supporters in caucus, and his immediate associates in Cabinet Council.
