PARIS LETTER
BY BOULVARDIER

(British United Press)

PARIS, Aug. 10.—Walking along the platform of the North Station as the Golden Arrow train bringing Mr. Arthur Henderson from London arrived, I was hailed by a burly Canadian whom I had not met for years, Major E. O. Leadley.

Leadley is a big publicity man. I use the term big deliberately, because he is a statuesque individual whose bulk towers even in a crowd. He was with a crowd too—a crowd of British newsmen. He had brought them over with him to see the wonders of the French Colonial Exposition, for which he is publicity director in the British Empire.

There were about 25 people in his party, editors, special correspondents and other writers representing newspapers throughout the Empire and they spent three or four days as Leadley's guest. They went away brimming over with pleasure, because when Leadley takes a task in hand he does it properly and he is an ideal host.

Since he came over in 1915 with the second Canadian Division, Leadley has never gone back to his native town, Toronto. He has made a big success of publicity, being among other things C. B. Cochran's right-hand man in putting over theatrical affairs. I believe he was one time in business in Winnipeg.

As London representative for the French Exhibition, the big Canadian travels between France and England a good deal, always bringing in his train at least a few distinguished visitors.

"I never thought I would one day become a Paris guide," Leadley declared to me laughingly. "I spent half my life now showing people the sights here. One of these days I will take on the job of writing your Paris letter for Canada. I think I know this town well enough by now!"

Not for many years—in fact, not since before the war—has there been such a brilliant ball at the British Embassy as the one given by Lord Tyrrell to mark the first official visit to Paris of the Duke and Duchess of York.

Not only did the occasion bring together the elite of the French and British colony, including many distinguished Canadians, but the new French President, Paul Doumer, and Madame Doumer also came along. Naturally, the French guests were particularly interested in the Smiling Duchess, whom they have known only by her photographs in the French illustrated papers. "Charming" was their verdict on Her Royal Highness, whose surprisingly natural grace is captivating. One is expected to write eulogious things about royalty, but in the case of the Scottish princess no adjectives are too flattering.

Mention of the British Embassy gives me the occasion to recall some interesting history connected with it. The 18th century mansion in the Faubourg St. Honoré which has housed Britain's ambassadors for over a century is perhaps the most beautiful diplomatic residence in the world. Certainly it is second to none in respect of its history and the personalities who have crossed its threshold.

The mansion, which is almost next door to the Presidential Palace, has a magnificent garden in which the ambassador gives afternoon parties which are a feature of Paris social life. The garden gives on to the spacious, leafy Champs-Élysées.

Just 119 years ago, at the close of the war between the two nations, the building became the British diplomatic headquarters and the first Ambassador to enter into office there was the Duke of Wellington. The Embassy possesses what is believed to be the finest service of gold plate in the world.

The ever increasing demand for hospital accommodation in Paris is a problem facing the municipal council here. The need for hospital beds, especially to deal with street accidents, has increased remarkably in the past few years and it is now estimated that for the Paris region there is a shortage of 7,500 beds for all kinds of cases.

Realising the seriousness of the situation, the Municipal Council has approved a scheme involving expenditure of nearly $25,000,000. Among other measures, it is proposed to complete six hospital buildings already in course of erection and to build new suburban hospitals. The old Beaujon Hospital is to be reconstructed and it is planned to make it a kind of skyscraper, the first skyscraper to dominate the horizon of the French capital.

There are 25 hospitals serving the 5,000,000 people in Paris, not including the British Herford Hospital and the American hospital at Neuilly. These latter mainly tend British or Americans who wish to be treated by doctors of their own nationality. Thus Canadians who happen to fall sick while in Paris usually prefer to go into the British Hospital than enter a French clinic.

The first citizen to swindle the social insurance laws is M. Rene Beyer who enjoyed 60,000 francs of state bounty about $2,400—by supposing himself the father of 42 children. Of these, 41 existed only in the fertile imagination of M. Beyer.

Before the magistrate, it was related that this remarkable opportunist had a passion for horse-racing and he spent his Sundays losing his money at the race-courses. His was always a record of losses and the burden was too much for his slender earnings as a boot-maker. His affairs sank so low that he became desperate and then hit on the novel idea of claiming state bounty as a father.

The idea occurred to him after the birth of his first son. A neighbor reminded him of the social insurance law whereby the Government gave a grant to the parents for every child born. M. Beyer made application and was duly paid out. From that time, M. Beyer became extraordinarily prolific and within a year had become the father, according to his affirmations, of 41 other babies. In this way he raked in 60,000 francs in bounties. His horse-racing activities liquidated the profits of his invisible progeny.

But all things came to an end—particularly such a good thing as M. Beyer's swindle. A cashier in a mangle where M. Beyer had registered some of his children became suspicious and started enquiries. These showed that the loss of a number of birth certificate forms had been reported from another mangle. Further investigation traced them to the home of M. Beyer, who in his spare time had rapidly added to his family at the rate of about one little Beyer a week by filling in the stolen birth certificates. II.

HAS FORTUNE TOLD; FINDS GOLD

(British United Press)

SYDNEY, Australia, August 10.—An Australian farmer, knowing nothing of mining, was persuaded by a fortune-teller to dig at a certain place, where he almost immediately struck rich gold.

Zaide Walters took in all the shows at a country fair, including the fortune-teller. "Look out for a mineral, it will make you richer than farming," he was told by the woman, a total stranger in the district. She described to him a place a mile from his own farm, where she said he would find gold.

Walters was so impressed that he started prospecting. Almost immediately he uncovered a richly studded with gold. A little distance away he struck an ever richer reef.

When Walters sought further advice from the fortune-teller she told him not to sell his claim until he had dug to a depth of at least 14 feet.

EXPLORES TO SEEK CAVE OF GOLD

(British United Press)

ADELAIDE, Australia, August 10.—Another Australian explorer is shortly to set out upon an expedition that has already claimed many lives. Only a few weeks ago, the body of L. M. Lasseter, a member of the Australian Gold Exploration Company, one of the many to lose his life in the vain search for the famed Alladin's Cave, was found somewhere on the arid desert of Central Australia.

Dr. Basedow, well-known Central Australian explorer, has recently come into the possession of a map which he claims gives the exact locality of the cave. As soon as he has collected sufficient funds, he and his party will start on the long journey across the Australian desert in search of it, where gold is believed to exist in fabulous quantities.

The story of the cave was first brought to civilization by a prospector named Earl, who told a stirring narrative of a cave studded with gold. Death intervened before he could return to claim his find. Other prospectors have brought back tales of the rich deposits and samples of ore.

"I have no doubt that the cave exists," declares Dr. Basedow, "and I am sure that the time is approaching for the desert to give up its secret. It will take more than three weeks to cover the distance from Alice Springs by camel."

The age-old problem of mother-in-law had cropped up for discussion at the men's club.

Mr. Cum-munday waxed bitter in his remarks against them.

"My mother-in-law has only visited me once since I got married," he mentioned.

"Well, you're jolly lucky," said Mr. Go-tuesday. "I can't see what you've got to complain about."

"Lucky, you say," said Mr. Cum-munday. "Why, she's never left."

NEW MOTORING DEVICE

(British United Press)

SYDNEY, Australia, August 10.—A new motoring device which is claimed to eliminate the present system of gear changing has been invented by Howard F. Hobbs, a South Australia orchardist, after experimenting for ten years.

A company has been formed to operate the invention, and Hobbs, who is only 28 years of age, has left for England with the patents.

He has had no technical training and has conducted most of his experiments in sheds attached to his father's market garden.

The gear can be applied to all machinery, where power has to be transferred from one part to another. It has been fitted to a seven horsepower Austin motor car and has been used for some thousands of miles without showing any defect. The mechanism is controlled by the accelerator pedal, the turning of a knob being sufficient to put a vehicle into reverse gear.

The highest engineering authorities in the state have approved of the invention after road tests and examination of its component parts. Motorists and others associated with machinery believe that the invention will revolutionise motoring.

WOMAN HELPS POLICEMAN

(British United Press)

SYDNEY, New South Wales, August 10.—An unusual runction took place near Sydney recently when police officers of the Parramatta division entertained Miss Winifred Crisp, who has assisted the police in thrilling circumstances. In presenting Miss Crisp with a leather suitcase on behalf of the force, Superintendent Beattie said that the young lady had performed, a very plucky action. When a constable was attacked by a number of men she went to his assistance and took a baton from a man who was about to strike the officer. She pulled away another man, who had the constable on the ground.
