WIN'S MESSAGE

Chapter 84

Never before had I done so much or accomplished so little, as during that mad, feverish, wasteful winter. Ordinarily I had a great deal of poise—that winter I had almost none.

At first I went about because my aunt wanted me to, then I began wanting hourly distraction. At first I felt it my duty to please my aunt and my father, since they were giving me a very generous income. To sure, it was my own money, some from my mother, and there was no one to inherit from either my aunt or my father, but myself. Yet I felt dependent and bound to please for that reason—though all the time the money meant little to me.

Part of it was reaction from the narrowness of the little town, too. "They were so self-satisfied, so smug, so sure their way was the only right one," I told Colin one day. And Colin nodded, slowly puffing away at his cigarette. "So I plunged in to every frivolity the city offered—and the city offered many distractions. No one ever mentioned Win to me. Everyone seemed to have forgotten him but me. Aunt Harriet now and then referred to my plate unfortunate affair," and father once remarked that he had seen Win on the street.

From mother Taylor, who now wrote me faithfully, I heard only that Win was still in the apartment we used to have together, that he was "doing very well," and that he wrote her about once in two months. In spite of her devotion, she managed to get along very well without him, she was busy running several "worthy cases" at home.

So I went everywhere I could. Luncheon, teas, dinners, theatres. Week-end parties for skating were the rage now, and summer houses were opened for winter guests. My aunt approved of a marvellous skating costume of blue and white wool that I bought, and had at lot of expensive pictures of me taken in it. These went about, with the usual "social notes." I wondered whether Win saw them? The pictures were very flattering, so I hoped he had.

Meantime I made myself very charming to Nardonski, having found out that Gwendolyn wished to keep him in her crowd. Meantime I helped my aunt in her gett- ing Gwen out of things. She was so successful that at the end of the winter no one saw that lady except at large parties—or about town "with people one wouldn't know," as my snobbish aunt put it.

Several times I saw Gwen when I was dining out. I always saw her in the audience at the big concerts, though no longer in the box where Nardonski bowed to her. She was an extraordinary figure that drew everyone's eyes. This winter she affected black, and went everywhere, in a time when short skirts and youthful styles were worn, in long, clinging trail- ings gowns of velvet and fur and satin.

I began to lose my dislike of her. I began to admire her rich hair in its eccentric fashion, and her curious, cat-like eyes.

Then came Win's message, and then more rumors, and once again I hated her with all the strength I had.

His letter, in his strange but so familiar handwriting, fairly leaped out at me from the morning's pile of mail. I tore it open with trembling fingers, my breakfast forgotten, the other letters neglected.

"My dear Connie," he began. "You seem to be the most popular young woman in New York, judging by the publicity you receive. You used to say you hated that, you quarreled with me violently once because I wanted you to send your picture to a magazine. I meet you now on every news stand."

"I have been thinking that, as you are so popular, you might find it inconvenient to be tied to me. If you want an entire separation, I shall do everything I can— I don't think I ever finished that letter. After all these months, Winthrop could still reach across the space between us and hurt me in a letter as he had so often hurt me in speech.

The rest of the letters stayed there until night. After I had gotten over the first sick pain of it, I dressed and went to my aunt's. I had to go to someone, and she would know whatever gossip was about.

I showed her the letter. "What have you heard about Win? Why should he suddenly write me like this?"

Aunt Harriet suddenly softened, and grew sweeter and more lovable than I had ever seen her.

"I suppose you had better know. A friend of Nedda's heard that he wants to marry Gwen. I thought, you know, that she would drop him as she drops all these chaps she grows enthusiastic about. But she hangs on to him—though I haven't seen them together for a long time. Win has a great deal of charm—she may really like him—"

"But a separation—a—" "Well, why not?" asked aunt Harriet calmly.

"I couldn't bear it," I said, and burst suddenly into hysterical tears.

But I was ashamed of showing my feelings, so I controlled myself as soon as possible.

"Now, don't go and call up that little Colin—" she said as I left. But that was my only refuge. I needed Colin's sympathy and strength as I had never needed anything before.

Monday—Heart Balm.

OBSERVATION

Perhaps there is no property in which men are more strikingly distinguished from each other, than in the various degrees in which they possess this faculty of Observation. The great herd of mankind, the "fruges consumere nati," pass their lives in listless inattention and indifference as to what is going on around them, being perfectly content to satisfy the mere cravings of nature, while those who are destined to distinction have a lynx-eyed vigilance that nothing can escape. You see nothing of the Paul Pry in them; yet they know all that is passing, and keep a perfect reckoning, not only of every interesting message, but of all the characters of the age who have any concern in them.—Wirt.

Carnation Milk

"From Contented Cows"

From the Heart of Canada's Best Dairy Lands

CARNATION Milk comes from the fine dairy counties. It is tested rigidly for purity and for richness, about 60% of the natural water content is taken from it by evaporation. Then it is sealed fresh in containers and sterilized.

Open a can when you need it. The milk is still fresh and sweet. It has the creamy consistency you will enjoy in coffee or tea, on cereals or fruit.

Add water to Carnation Milk—a little more than an equal part and you have milk of natural consistency. It is safe—absolutely. But more than that, it's convenient, economical—your grocer supplies you! Order several tall (16 oz.) cans or a case of 48 cans.

The Carnation Cook Book contains many a good recipe. Write for a copy to-day. Free on request. Try this recipe yourself.

CREAM FILLING

One-third cup flour, 1 1/2 cups water, 2/3 cup Carnation Milk, 2 eggs, 3/4 teaspoonful salt, 3/4 cup sugar, 1 teaspoonful vanilla. Moisten the flour with a little cold milk, add this to the hot milk mixed with the water. Cook 15 minutes in double boiler. Beat the eggs, add sugar and salt. Add to them the hot liquid, return to double boiler and cook until egg thickens, stirring constantly. Remove from fire and when cool add flavoring.
