Not All Beer And Skittles

Dr. Dafoe Gives Dionne Sisters Their First Intimation That All is Not Right With the World by Spoiling Their Dish-Breaking Game

CALLANDER, Ont., Dec. 1—Yvonne Dionne—one of the sisters you've heard so much about—sat down to her breakfast table this morning and found the cereal, fruit and milk she polishes off to start each day reposing in new dishes.

Yvonne—with her sisters a year and a half old today—noticed the change and started the procedure the quintuplets have agreed upon among themselves to initiate new dishes. She grasped a silver spoon in her right hand and brought it down smartly on the edge of the cereal bowl.

Nothing happened, so Yvonne lost the little patience one can expect in an 18-months-old quint and dropped the whole business on the nursery floor. Strangely, the dish didn't break. Wide-eyed, Yvonne looked up at Dr. Allan Roy Dafoe and her nurses, who laughed somewhat sheepishly at the first trick they have played on Yvonne and her sisters.

Unbreakable Dishes

The dish—like all others in the quintuplet home now—is unbreakable, an innovation Dr. Dafoe thought necessary to keep the income the youngsters get from movies, newspaper photographs and endorsements from being dissipated in the crash of crockery on the nursery floor.

It all started a couple of months ago when one of Yvonne's sisters tossed a building block through a plate-glass window. That gave the Dionne sisters their first taste of excitement. After the building blocks were gently stored out of sight, Yvonne and her sisters tried out various alternatives but never really got the same success as they did with dishes.

First the glass tumblers went. It really was an accident to start with. Annette dropped a glass and there was a crash. Yvonne, Cecile and Marie liked the noise and tossed theirs to the floor. Then they began on the crockery. It was a joke around the hospital at first. Dr. Dafoe would ask in the morning, "Well, how many dishes yesterday?" While the nurses could answer "one" or "two" things were all right. But when they reported whole sets were being smashed each week the physician and guardian to the famous youngsters called a halt.

"It was a mean trick, really," he said today. "But it had to be done. I guess we've given them their first hint life isn't all beer and skittles."

Almost Perfect

But Yvonne and the rest took it all philosophically, and Dr. Dafoe believes even so great a disappointment as realizing dishes are unbreakable can keep the youngsters from continuing to be the healthiest, happiest youngsters he had ever seen.

Modest about himself, the Callander physician rarely brags about his babies. But today he said: "They are the nearest thing to perfect youngsters anyone could hope to see."

That's probably the broadest statement he has ever made about them. For months after they were born May 28, 1934, he was cautious with his statements about their health. They were either "doing nicely" or "keeping away from illness." Now that he admits they are nearly perfect the world can be satisfied they are something more than that.

Black Troop Fight Beside Black Shirts

ROME, Dec. 2—(C.P.-Havas)—The total Italian forces engaged in the Ethiopian war are estimated by authoritative sources at 310,000.

This expeditionary force, divided into the two armies of the Tigre and Ogaden provinces, includes also certain native troops and "bands" incorporated in the Italian forces and officered for the most part by Italians.

These native contingents, supported by artillery barrage, are sufficient to maintain their front intact in the Setit region which lies between Aksum and the Sudanese frontier. The metropolitan forces are estimated at 250,000 while the native regulars number approximately 60,000. In addition to these effectives, 40,000 civilian workers, mostly road builders, masons and engineers, are working in conjunction with the army and the engineer corps.

The greatest numbers of troops are concentrated on the Eritrean frontier, where an army of 260,000 is drawn up. The Somaliland army is not more than 50,000 in all.

In Eritrea four divisions of infantry are stationed. The Gavinana Division under Gen. Nino Villa Santa, the Sabauda Division under Gen. Ezio Babini, the Gran Sasso Division under Gen. Alberto Terziani and the Duke of Bergamo and the Sila Division under Gen. Francesco Bertini. They represent about 72,000 men.

There are five blackshirt divisions in Eritrea; namely, the "Twenty-Third of March," under Gen. Ettore Bastico; the "Twenty-Eighth of October," under Gen. Umberto Somma; the "Third of January," under Gen. Alessandro Traditi; the "Second of February," under Gen. Attilio Teruzzi and the Duke of Pistoia; and the "Twenty-First of April," under Gen. Giacoma Appiotti. These divisions represent about 70,000 men.

There also are in Eritrea two independent groups of blackshirt troops numbering about 20,000 men. The native regulars are an army corps of 40,000 men divided into two divisions.

Special services include the tank corps, heavy artillery units, health service, and the engineers with 58,000 men because of the need for extensive road building and the absence of all drainage systems.

The troops actually in action in Eritrea total about 160,000 men, divided into three army corps. The first army corps, commanded by Gen. Ruggiero Santini, is composed of one division of infantry of 18,000 men, a division of blackshirts of 14,000, and a group of blackshirt militiamen totalling 10,000 men. This force also includes two battalions of Ethiopian troops under the deserter Ras Gugsa, guarding the mountain passes, where artillery groups are also stationed. Together with Bersaglieri and engineers they number in all 8,000 men. The second army corps is commanded by Gen. Pietro Maravigna, and is composed of one infantry division of 18,000 men, a blackshirt division of 14,000, together with natives, artillery and engineers.

The third army corps is commanded by Gen. Alessandro Pirzio-Biroli and includes two divisions of native troops with detachments from other armies, all of which totals 35,000 men. This army compromises new units of blackshirt troops totalling 10,000 men and a special corps.

The reserve troops in Eritrea constitute a force of 100,000 men, including two divisions of infantry, the Gran Sasso and the Sila divisions, and three divisions of blackshirts.

The number of tanks in service in Eritrea totals from 100 to 150.

Troops in the Somaliland sector are composed of one division of infantry, the Peloritana, commanded by Gen. Giuseppe Pavone with 18,000 men, supported by heavy artillery, engineers and other units totalling 30,000 men of the metropolitan force. Native troops in Gen. Pavone's army are estimated at 20,000 composed of bands of Somali irregulars, called "Dubats," with Italian officers. There are 100 tanks supporting this force together with armored cars.

The air force has 350 planes on all fronts, two-thirds of which are in Eritrea. Although they are not the latest types of speed planes, the machines are good recent models. The Capronis are used for bombardment and the Romeos for scout work and occasionally for bombardment also. The air service in Eritrea is fraught with difficulties since many of the air bases are from 6,000 to 7,000 feet in altitude.

In Somaliland, the aviation camps are along the coast and at a considerable distance from the field of opertions. Nevertheless in the interior, the planes have "service fields" of doubtful value at their disposal.

LADY MENDL'S HAIR WILL SOON BE GREEN

NEW YORK, Dec. 3—Lady Mendl, the former Elsie de Wolfe, whom Paris dressmakers have just named as "the world's best-dressed woman," arrived from Europe yesterday and said her blue-tinted hair will soon be green.

She also confused the "best-dressed woman" issue by naming her own choice for the title.

"I think Mrs. Reginald Fellowes of Paris is the best-dressed woman in the world," she asserted. "But I wasn't surprised when they chose me. I've been called that all my life."

Lady Mendl was wearing an ultra-short skirt. Her shoes had low heels.

"I spent between $10,000 and $15,000 on clothes this year,' she said.
