A Sweetheart at Thirty
THE STORY OF A WOMAN'S TRANSFORMATION
By Marion Rubincam
BUD IS IN TROUBLE.
Chapter 70

Violet was crying! Violet was in trouble—or was worried over something! Instantly I forgot Francis Meade and that strange sweet good bye in the hall—though my hand almost tingled because he had held it so. I went over to the girl.

"What is it, dear? Tell me about it," I began coaxingly.

"For answer she cried still harder, burying her face down in the pillows.

I patted her shoulder. I felt that for though I and I were fond of such misery, though the love and sympathy between us was much greater than what usually exists between an aunt and a niece, yet we were never demonstrative. And when she cried she preferred to bury her head in the cushions, rather than to sob on anyone's shoulder.

"I patted her shoulder and arm gently, and presently she stopped crying and turned around to face me.

"Now then—" I began coaxingly.

"Bud's Bud," she said. "It's always Bud somehow, whenever I'm not happy."

"What about Bud?"

"Well, he telephoned—late this evening."

"I thought you were going out with him, and then come home and study."

"I was," she said. "He was to come at eight. But before that he said he couldn't come and I thought either of going to Helen's or out with Toby. After you left I decided to stay in and wait and study until he let me know definitely. But he didn't even phone, and I gave him up by half past nine. Then at 10 he called up and he said he was in a lot of trouble and he had a hard time phoning me but that I wasn't to worry because he would be all right. Well I was all upset over that, and I wanted to know more about it. I didn't know what he was even talking about. Finally, he said that Pete had been arrested."

"Pete arrested?"

"I could not grasp what she meant. 'Yes, Pete was arrested late this afternoon.'"

"But why?" I wanted to know.

"Neither of us cared for Pete. He was a curious mixture of a roughness and a smoothness that I have heard described as 'only' Neither of us trusted him. But he was very generous, he seemed really fond of Bud, and he had gone out of his way to be nice to him many times. Pete's type was always like that—a mixture."

"Well, Bud said that Pete played one of his tips—he had to tell me in a roundabout fashion, he said, so if anyone were listening in nothing could be bound out from him what he said. Pete played a tip, some stock should have gone down, he sold short. I don't exactly understand, except that he was betting that it would go down and it went up."

"Bud said he had to cover then which is something else I don't quite know, except that it meant he had to put up more money to hold what money he already had on it. Well he didn't have it. So he thought he could get some as he got it before—you remember."

"Nor I forget."

"Yes you do, he was sent to deposit money and he took a thousand, fixed up the bank book, and then when he played and won, he put the thousand back, and changed around the book again. Well, he went to the cashier at his place as he always does, to carry the bank deposits and the man looked at him rather queerly and said they were sending another man that day."

"That alarmed Pete, but he thought he had fixed up the book so no one would know he took the money. And even if they did know it, he had put it back, it was only that he would lose his job. He hadn't really stolen, you see, he explained 'since he had paid back what he took.'"

"I nodded and she went on.

"However, he had to have some money, because he had risked everything he had on the stock he was playing with."

"He might sell his car," I suggested.

"Violet smiled a little, through the tears that were still on her face.

"I imagine he thought the stock would do what he wanted pretty soon, and that selling the car was not necessary. He only wanted money for a few hours, just long enough for this stock to turn

"Did you bring any of them?"

"No, we didn't."

Cross and Cecelia looked at each other blankly.

"Too bad you forgot that one thing," commented Marvin. "I am sure they would have been very helpful."

There was just a note of suspicion in the young man's voice. Both Farley and the general had the same thought. It was strange that they would bring all this other evidence and neglect the one thing that would be absolute proof in case the victim of amnesia should doubt.

There was a painful pause, then Cross suddenly said:

"Wait a minute. There was a squib in the San Antonio paper. 'Have you got it?' asked both Marvin and Farley."

Cross produced a folded and dusty paper from the pocket of his silk auto duster and handed it to Phil. There it was, a two-column head on the first page.

"Clue to Lost Flyers."

"It is reported that Phillip J. McInnis, recently lost in Mexico with Jerry Waldron, is alive Mrs. Marvin's bride of a few months, is on her way to Mexico, in company of Sylvester Cross, a lawyer, who is said to have brought the news."

The paper fluttered out of his hand to the ground.

CHAPTER XI.

Farley picked up the newspaper as it fell from Phil's nerveless hand. There was on mistake. It was the San Antonio Gazette. He looked at Marvin. The boy's eyes wandered to the door that led to Inez's room. The old man knew that they were all face to face with a tragedy—the tragedy of a broken heart.

It was not the agony on Phil's face that worried Farley. It was clear that he was crushed for the moment, but then at any instant returning memory would blot it all out with his wife's love. No, it was his poor little adopted daughter whom he feared. He must think fast for her and do what he could to soften the blow.

"Well," he said. "I guess that settles it. It is going to be hard for you Mrs. Marvin for a while until things adjust themselves, but it will be so much harder for my poor little girl. Of course, you must both go at once."

General Innocencio at this coughed and looked disquietingly at Cross. The lanky person evaded his eye. The Mexican sauntered over and leaned against the gate.

"Yes, Mr. Cross," said Cecelia, "we must both go at once. Mr. Farley is absolutely right Phil don't see it is the only course to take."

With eyes still fixed on Inez's door Phil answered:

"No, I don't see."

Farley placed both hands on the young man's shoulders and said:

"My boy, it's this way—you were a stranger and we took you in—my poor little girl and I. We nursed you and we tried to be kind to you. Now poor soul she has learned to care for you."

"The boy started to interrupt.

"Oh, I don't blame you. You meant no harm but now there is only one thing to do. She must not see you—you must go and go right now."

"With out even saying goodbye?"

"With out even saying goodbye. This is a terrible moment for her. In fact it is dangerous."

"Dangerous?" repeated Marvin. "Yes dangerous. I am afraid I can't control her and I fear for what she might do if she knew that you were going to leave her. The kindest way is to go without a word. I will tell her that I advised it—that we all insisted on it being done at once."

"Quite right!" said Cross—the sooner we go the better. The car is all ready."

"Well my boy" said Farley, as they all looked to him for his answer.

"I can't answer now—you don't understand. There is something you don't know."

He paused and looked at Cecelia.

"Speak up," Farley advised him.

"Mrs. Marvin will understand."

She nodded and the boy braced himself to speak when he heard the voice of Inez calling from the house:

"I'm ready now."

"It's no use, you'll have to excuse me a moment—I've got to think. I've got to be myself."

He dashed out the gate. General Innocencio, who had posted himself there to prevent that very thing, glanced at his face and around and go down again.

"What did he do then?"

"He went to Simons to borrow some. You remember him and Simons gave it. He loaned it to him on a certain condition. But Bud wouldn't tell me—he simply said that's all he could say over the phone, and that he would come around tomorrow morning. He said he was afraid the police were after him."

"After Bud?"

"I think as a witness against Pete, VI explained. And he wasn't going home tonight. I asked what he was going to do and he said, stay in a hotel and that we were not to worry."

At the word, her voice broke. She turned again to the police. She sobbed a little more. I got up quietly, and went out into the kitchen to fix our breakfast cereal. I was sorry for VI than for Bud. Tomorrow—His Story

IN MEMORIAM
MRS. ALICE McELROY

At New Haven on October 22nd, there passed away one of the oldest and most beloved residents in the person of Mrs. Alice McElroy. She deceased for many years an invalid, had been cut off from all active participation in life. Nevertheless, by having been able to maintain an unusually clear mind and cheerful disposition she found happiness in everything about her; never whispering a word at complaint—just loving and glad to see and talk with friends both old and new and making each one happier by her sweet motherly touch.

She is survived by her five sons and three daughters. Her husband, Mr. Andrew McElroy, predeceased her August 4th, 1917.

The funeral took place on Tuesday, October 24th from her home to St. Ann's Church, where a High Mass of Requiem was celebrated by the pastor, Reverend Thomas Curran, after which interment was made in the adjoining cemetery.

MR. JOHN WALKER

At Freetown on Sunday evening John Walker, Elder, aged 84 years and 10 days.

Mr. Walker was born at Kelvin and was married there to Miss Janet Neil of that place, and subsequently removed to Freetown and lived where Mr. Geo. Paynter now resides. A few years ago he sold his farm and went to live with his son J. S. Walker, merchant of Freetown.

Mr. Walker had a large family, 5 boys and 5 girls. The boys were: James in Arizona, U. S. A.; Robert in Summerside; Andrew, who died 29 years ago; Patterson in Kensington and J. Stavert Walker of Freetown. The daughters were: Mrs. John Palmer of Freetown, Ltd.; Mrs. R. A. Taylor, Summerside; Mrs. J. S. Wright, died Oct. 9, 1919; Mrs. Joseph Taylor, Yarmouth, N. S.; and Mrs. Dr. Jardine of Kensington.

Mr. John Walker loved his family and gave them all a good start in life. He was an industrious Christian gentleman, beloved not only by his own family but by all who knew him. He was the Senior Elder in the Bedouque Presbyterian Church and acted that high office for many years. He was also the S. S. Superintendent in the Union S. S. at Freetown for many years, only surrendering that office this past autumn, owing to ill health. He was faithful unto death and has no doubt received the crown of life. The funeral services were held on Tuesday at 2 p.m. at the funeral home, 1111 Main Street. The service was conducted by Rev. D. K. Ross of Bedouque, assisted by Rev. Mr. Morris of Summerside and Rev. Mr. Ayers of Kensington. Mr. Bentley sang very acceptably the favourite hymn of the deceased. "I will wait for my saviour." Among the beautiful floral wreaths was a pillow from the session of Bedouque Congregation. The remains were interred in the Bedouque Cemetery.

"I look pretty fly, eh?" cried Inez merrily, as she burst in, arrayed in Marvin's grotesque fitting leather flying dress.

"She felt the ominous silence and looked around."

"Oh, I didn't know somebody was here, Meester Cross what you had out about my Gringo?"

"You'd better not come out just now dear," said Farley.

"Why?" asked Inez in astonishment. "Why, when Meester Cross have brought word of my Gringo, King of Hearts?"

"No," said General Innocencio in his most commanding voice, "you go back to your room."

"What's the matter?" she looked round and her eye fell on Cecelia.

"What the lady! oh, she will forgive the fly clothes."

Down pranced the girl, whipped off her helmet and goggles and opened up her leather coat she came close to Cecelia.

"How do you do? I only pretend aviator for him. You know my nice Gringo I bet you come from far off where he live. You know him pretty well? Who are you?"
