As the gray dawn broke over the landscape, two intrepid hunters bore with spartan vigour the cold blasts of north winds, and huddled lower in their shabby craft, for shelter. As the heavy mist slowly dispelled, heads were cautiously raised above the gunwale for a glance at the flock of black ducks, which floated gently on the quiet Brudenell River. The gunners carefully manoeuvred their craft so that they might present a broadside attack on the luckless ducks, which had chosen that place for a quiet rest. When all was in preparation, the hunters cautiously rose to take aim with their trusty firearms, but the ducks sensing danger rose on the wing, and with four shots one wounded duck stayed on the water. Abandoning now all caution, the pair shipped oars and paddled furiously to catch their quarry. However, each time the boat approached, the duck would dive, and lead them on another merry chase. Unknown to the adventurers, another pair of eyes were greedily watching this mad churning of the water as they tore after their quarry. With many expletives of wrath, the one would direct the other to the new appearance of the elusive duck which by now had his pursuers well in hand. Finally the oarsman arose, threw a shell in the gun, and let blaze. Again the duck went down, amid the explosive sounds of frustration of the two boatmen. Then came the climax, the duck having eluded his pursuers, landed in the cove near the watchers, who carefully took aim, and walked home with one black duck, leaving the two still paddling in search of the lost quarry. — Lan.
