NEIL SENDS BARBARA FROM THE ROOM WHILE THE REPORTER TALKS TO HIM

CHAPTER CIX.

When the reporter announced his errand Neil turned a bit more ghastly, and I trembled so I could scarcely stand. It was my introduction to newspaper tactics, and I was frightened as well as anxious.

"You are talking of that scurrilous article?" Neil pointed to the paper lying on the floor, the bold headlines staring up at us.

"Yes. Our paper wishes to state the facts. Scott has given us his version, now we want yours."

"Of course. He claims to be the aggrieved party. He is going to make it hard for you Mr. Forbes. If you can clear things up it would be advisable before he goes any further. He is very vindictive," he finished with a meaningful glance at me which I rightly judged to mean that he had something to say to Neil which he preferred I shouldn't hear.

"Leave us Barbara. Mr. Moore—the young man gave his name. Mr. Moore probably feels embarrassed by your presence," he added, the last sentence so sarcastically I wondered, "Please sit to remain." I replied quietly. Then to Mr. Moore, "I know all about what the other paper has said, why shouldn't I hear the rest—whatever you know?" How I wished I might say with truth that I knew all about my husband's business and that it was all a lie, a monstrous lie. But I knew absolutely nothing, yet I must show my faith in Neil—even though I felt there was some foundation for the awful scandal.

"As Mr. Forbes wishes."

"No—go, Barbara."

There was nothing for me to do but to leave them together. But I didn't go beyond the reach of their voices. I sat on the stairs where they curved upward and so out of sight should the door of the music room open. It was fortunate I did so, as, after a few minutes they came out into the hall.

"I have some papers that perhaps may interest you," I heard Neil say, that some peculiarly sarcastic tone in his voice as they moved toward the library. "Some with Scott's signature."

"They didn't quite close the library door and an occasional sentence would float to me. Then Neil became excited and talked in loud angry tones, but I could not catch the words save as I sometimes caught Scott's name. Then came a question in the clear, quiet voice of the gentlemanly reporter:

"Scott is the only man you fear?"

"Yes, the squealer!"

"I am afraid Mr. Forbes you are not facing this as you should. There are others—many of them who are ready to make trouble."

"What others?"

"Men and women who have invested their money with you hoping for the enormous profits you have promised them in your circulars." As he finished I heard the rustle of paper. Then after a moment he added: "Unless you are frank and tell your side of the story quickly—you see Mr. Forbes I am supposing you can contradict Scott's charges—it will give the yellow sheets a chance for a lot of sob stuff—widows and orphans deluded, etc."

"Where did you get that circular?"

"I am afraid I can't tell you. But you may be sure that my paper isn't the only one with a copy. In fact Mr. Forbes we have planned to print this in the morning unless I hear something from you that prevents."

A groan, stifled, was his answer. Then, to my disappointment one of them closed the heavy door tightly and I heard nothing more. I crouched on the stairs some time longer, then as I heard them come out, and Neil bid him a hasty good night I scurried up to my room so that Neil might not know that I was listening.

I sat by the window, my mind in a perfect whirl. What in the world did "sob stuff" mean? That reporter had said the yellow journals would print it. I knew nothing of newspaper terms and it made me doubly anxious for that reason. Would Neil never come up so I could question him? I asked myself just as I heard his heavy dragging steps so unlike his usual quick climbing of the
