INSTALMENT XV

That was a light upon him, and it made her very thoughtful and silent as they mounted and started for home.

"What a mad business our marriage was!" she broke out suddenly, her voice unsteady with the emotion that had been stirred during those moments of nearness.

He looked at her quickly. "You've reason to think so," he said, after a pause.

"Oh, I don't mean because of what you have told me... or what you have done... Even if those things hadn't existed... it would still have been utterly mad."

"Because... we knew so little about each other, Jim... Apart from those... terrible things I didn't know of you... If they had never been... I still... knew... scarcely anything... She drew a breath. "And what do you know of me?" she asked, turning in her saddle so that she faced him.

"That, in spite of all your courage, you are afraid of a thunder-storm," he answered non-committally.

When they reached home... he dismounted quickly, came to her and held out his hands to aid her. There was a challenge in his eyes, and for a moment she hesitated.

"I've held you in my arms this morning Lucy," he said scarcely audibly. "What's the odds?" She put her hands on his shoulders and slid through the circle of his arms to the ground.

"I said I'd make you," he whispered again.

"Well! You've made me!" she cried and left him, to run quickly into the house.

When she went into her room to change her wet things, she saw on her dressing table, in a little glass vase, the posy of rose-buds Jim had offered her before they went out. Crushed and battered, but showing signs of recovery. Somehow the sight of them caught at her heart, and she stood looking down at them through sudden tears. She was free now, of the horror of Jim that had made her refuse to take them from his hand. And it was like the sudden warm thawing of an icy touch to be free of that. During those moments of nearness, when he had held her in his arms and comforted her fears away with his strength, he had become something new to her. No her thoughts broke off sharply and her heart quickened. No; not new. He had become again the man he had been... Thought went racing ahead then, bringing revelation upon revelation.

She had been thinking in her bitterness that the knowledge of his treachery made of him a rather terrible stranger; that this whole nature was colored by it; but she knew now that this wasn't so. The desire for revenge was false to his inmost nature; something that owed its birth to those three years of spiritual agony. If those three years had never been, this terrible thing would never have been, either. Take it away, look beyond it, at Jim Lee, as he essentially was, and he was the man as she had first known him. It was those three years that had wrought the change in him. They had been sweet and free to her, but what had they been to him?

The memory of that cruise with her father; the pictures it brought to her mind of wide expanses of sky and sea; of wild wind and dashing spray; of white sails against deep summer blue; the wheeling of gulls and all the things that speak of freedom, brought home to her, with the poignant vividness of contrast, the horror that he, at the same time, had been enduring.

He, with his mighty body; his great strength; his vigor of mind and strange intensity of feeling to be imprisoned. That thought brought her first, real glimpse of what the tragedy of those three years must have been to him. And suddenly, as she stood there picturing it, her anger at his wrong against herself dwindled, and its place was taken by almost unbearable sympathy. There was so much that was fine in him. She found herself counting up his good qualities in her thoughts. He was absolutely generous with money. His servants, one and all, adored him. Huge, dark, unsmiling as he was, children seemed always willing to be friends with him. She had seen instances of that on their rides together; and in his treatment of the children of one of the gardeners. He seemed to have none of the small meannesses. Even his revengefulness was a big sweeping passion. And then came suddenly the realization of one other fine quality; and that was the very old one of chivalry. Yes, in spite of all he had done, that quality was his. For burning as he had been with hatred and revenge; intoxicated as he had been with the success of his schemes, he had told her the truth on that night of their marriage, and had spared her the deepest of all degradations. Admittedly, it was a terrible truth he had told, but he had told it to her that night instead of later; risked all he had worked for to save her from himself.

She knew then, quite simply, quite clearly, that she loved him still. The truth came to her so quietly that she did not notice the moment of its coming; she just knew it was there. Feeling had been numbed within her; she had been like a dead thing; but she was alive again now, and she knew that whatever he had done, he was that man she had first loved... And a deep and useful bit of knowledge came to her in that moment; that human beings can do one kind of thing and still be quite another. And it was what Jim was that counted. Not what this terrible spirit of revenge, born of a very bitter accident of fate, had impelled him to do.

She was glad, then; glad with everything in her, that she had not let him. For perhaps, after all there was, as she had said, light ahead... At any rate, here was the first gleam; the ever wonderful gleam of understanding.

As she stood there, heedless of her dripping clothes, her maid came into the room to help her to change. Seeing her looking at the buds, the girl said, smilingly:

"Oh, madam, I found them on the floor in the drawing-room. You must have dropped them, and looks as if they've been trod on, too, poor things. But I knew you'd be sorry to have them die, because I saw Master picking them for you this morning... The girl beamed at Lucy, fully assured of her approval. Lucy gave it, not without difficulty.

"Thank you, Anne. That was very kind of you... Her lips were trembling badly. Those battered little buds seemed now to stand for so much to her.

"Quite beginning to pick up, aren't they?" said the beaming Anne, very happily, as she attentively helped Lucy out of her wet things and into dry ones.

When the girl had gone, Lucy went to the dressing table and stood looking down at the tiny flowers. Then put out a hand, quickly, and took them out of the case, dried their stems on a towel, and pinned them into the front of her dress.

At lunch, Lee noticed them there, pointed to them and asked abruptly:

"Same ones?"

She colored.

"Yes."

"Why do you wear them now?" he asked.

She hesitated, then: "As a sign that I have been wrong; and I know it," she answered him slowly.

There was admiration in his dark eyes as he looked at her. "That was plucky of you, Lucy," he said.

"I don't know about it being plucky especially," she replied. "It was the truth."

Very Red Pimples Caused Disfigurement. Cuticura Healed.

"The trouble began with pimples on my face and later spread to my neck and chest. Some of the pimples were large and others small, and they were very red. They scaled over and caused disfigurement for a while. The trouble lasted about eight months. "Other remedies had been used without success. I began using Cuticura Soap and Ointment and in about five months I was completely healed, after using three boxes of Cuticura Soap and two boxes of Cuticura Ointment."
