Commodore Norah

By ANGUS MACVICAR

"Get her going, Jock," said David quietly, and his lieutenant sprang forward to catch the engine into life. Pushing a broken engine wave at front of her, the Silver Spray chugged round the nose of the pier into harbour. Close behind, in single file, came the rest of the McGregors' fleet.

As the line swung past the opening of the other side of the pier, Mary explained the reason for Manoeuvre into position for leaving David glimpsed a little figure in a yellow oilskin and sou'-wester standing in the side of the pier, a man person who was probably a member of the crew. She was annoyed when she turned away, a pulse hammering in his cheek. But others among his crew did not turn away when they realized they were going to get a fair start of the Grant fleet.

"One young fellow shouted across the angry water.

"Yahoo! Are ye feared of the weather, Norah Grant?"

On the deck of the Mary Rose, Norah stood tapping impatiently with her fingers on the railing. She was annoyed by the shout which had come from one of the McGregors' crew. She was annoyed that her rival had been able to leave the harbour before her, though she knew her boats were, on the whole, faster than his, and that he would secure no start of the Grant fleet.

Hector Menzies, beside her, was also annoyed. He hadn't wanted to go out with Norah in the Mary Rose, but she had insisted on it. She was annoyed by the shout which had come from one of the McGregors' crew. She was annoyed that her rival had been able to leave the harbour before her, though she knew her boats were, on the whole, faster than his, and that he would secure no start of the Grant fleet.

"Can't you get a move on, Brown?" he snapped to old Donald, who was standing by the wheel. "The Mary Rose is shivering under her blunt nose towards the harbour.

"Dinna fash yersel', Mr. Menzies," returned Donald. "We're main' as good times as we can."

Like a wild duck with her progeny swimming behind her, the Mary Rose swung out from the harbour, ahead of the other Grant fleet. On one side she passed the flashing buoy, which marked a hidden sandbank running out from the flat land between the pier and the shore. The towering mass of the Black Rock, a huge crag of basalt which arose abruptly from the water and soared to a height of over a hundred feet, that sinister cliff, against which the sea was now dashing with white spouts of foam, a hundred vessels were crowded together. The Mary Rose seemed to draw craft towards it, especially when the wind blew from the eastern air, as was the case on this occasion.

"Keep her well out, over by the buoy," murmured Donald to the steersman. "If anything went wrong with the engine, she'd be stuck under the Black Rock for sure."

The skiff rose and fell in the open sea. Her rounded prow swung as she lifted half out of the water. "Oh, old Donald's advice Norah and Menzies went forward and sat in the skiff. They were in the habit of passing the time until the fishing ground was reached and hard work began. It was especially dry in the spring, and though, when Mary Rose plunged against the sea, water would come sometimes come trickling down through the seams of the hatch, it still quired about in their ears. In one corner was an oil stove, clamped to the deck, on which, during a lull in the fishing operations, they brewed a strong tea would be brewed.

The young men who made up the party in the forecabin were somewhat bored. They had been waiting for Norah and her fiancé. They wanted to play cards, which was their usual occupation in the circumstances, but they were bored. They were bored. They were bored.

"Oh, Johnny" Film Swift

Moving Musical Romance

Music, laughter, and a gay romantic story are the pleasing elements found in Universal's "Oh, Johnny, How You Can Love," which opened yesterday at the Capitol Theatre.

The neatly contrived screenplay highlights the song from which the picture derives its title and features Tom Brown and Peggy Moran. Moving at fast tempo, the story reveals surprising experiences of a traveling salesman and a run-away heiress. The two get mixed up with a band of bank robbers who try to turn an elopement into a kidnapping.

As the young salesman who comes to the rescue of the girl, proves himself thoroughly familiar with the handling of both comedy and dramatic scenes, Miss Moran, a promising screen newcomer, plays her role with the zest and skill of a real trouper.

Allen Jenkins as the not-so-tough gangster is seen in a portrayal which provides an ideal vehicle for his comedy talents. Donald Meck is the timid manager of an auto-courthouse whose hobby, invention, eventually brings disaster to the crooks.

Especially written for the picture were the tuneful melodies "Swing Charlot, Swing," and "Maybe You Like What I Like," both composed by Frank Skinner and Paul Gerard Smith. Supporting players in the film are Isabel Jewell, Horace McMahon and Joe Downing.

LOBSTER LIMIT FIXED

OTTAWA, April 15—Fisheries Minister, Michael, has announced establishment of a minimum size limit for the capture of lobsters. The limit will be 6 1-2 inches and will apply to all districts in the Maritime Provinces where a size limit is not already in force. In 1930 lobsters measuring less than 6 1-2 inches constituted 17.9 per cent. of the catch and in 1938 this figure rose to 30.1 per cent. At present it is higher than that, according to Mr. Michael.

"Many lobster canners are greatly concerned and have expressed alarm because small lobsters are less profitable to handle in a cannery, and the opinion is widespread that a lobster less than 6 1-2 inches in length is not worth handling."

With Housecleaning hints, received $2. Government Grant. Meeting closed with the King A. delicious lunch was then served by the Lunch Committee.

MENZIES DISAPPEARS

For over an hour the varying went on. Norah heard of sharks leaping in and feeding back on the water with such a resounding smack that on a calm night it could be distinguished eight miles away. She leaped, then, some ten specimens over 50 ft. long several tons in weight had been caught by harpoon and killed for their oil; that the food of the herring is the same as that of the herring—and that in consequence herring grew scarce whenever they appeared in the vicinity.

"I doot the Government will ha'e to tak' a hand in killing them off," observed one of the crew. "If they're left alone they soon be us' nee herring left for us' ta' catch."

Norah found the conversation fascinating. For the first time she realized that if her men were much more interesting, much more human and important, than that of her city friends. For the first time she realized that each individual employed had a price and self-respect similar to her own. During one fleeting minute it was borne in upon Donald Brown that the continual driving, might be as unpleasant for these men as it would be for herself. She half understood what Donald Brown had meant by saying that if she and David McGregor combined forces, the lives of her crews, even though they did not make quite so much money, would be far more worth while.

For their part, the men, after overcoming their initial shyness in the presence of their temporary boss, found that the girl was perhaps not so haughty as they had imagined. They perceived in her many of the traits which had made her father, Peter Grant, so popular among them. She showed no sign of being distressed by the antics of the skiff, she did not seem to mind getting tar and fish-scales on her clothes, she was a good listener and, despite her refined accent and background of book-learning, she did, after all, know quite a good deal about herring-fishing.

Norah's attention had been so
