The bidding:
South North East
2♠ Pass 3♠ 3♥
4♥ Pass 4♠ 5♠
6♠ 7♠(?) Pass Pass
7♠ Pass Pass

West's seven-diamond bid appears to have been a "push," but actually that contract would have been a beautiful sacrifice. If South had been willing to accept it, South was shrewd in declining the bid offering, but his play at seven spades negated his bidding prowess. West opened the diamond jack card, obviously proceeding on the theory that it did not matter which card was played from dummy, declarer put up the king. He ruffed away East's ace, laid down one high trump to test that situation, and, when he discovered that East was void, he went ahead and drew the rest of West's cards in the suit. South realized that it would be very dangerous to go to dummy and take the heart finesse, then to try to ruff a heart, because West was probably short and would be able to overruff dummy on the third round of hearts. Unfortunately, however, after trumps were drawn, declarer found that the club suit was also badly divided—as he should have expected it to be in view of the bidding—and it became impossible to avoid the loss of a heart trick to East even though the finesse was, of course, successful. The play of the diamond king at the first trick ruined everything!
