The Third Warning

A Mystery Love Story

By Augustus Malt

"Won't you come in. My name's Drysdale."

"Ah! Thank you." In the sitting room, he laid his hat on the table and looked at me with another smile.

"I am the tenant of Black Edge farmhouse. I would particularly like a few words with you, Mr. Drysdale!"

"Black Edge!" repeated the name in astonishment and my expression must have shown my surprise, for he gave an amused laugh and said: "Why, didn't you know you had a tenant there?"

"Of course—of course, I know," I said shortly. "But I'm afraid I didn't know your name," I added with candor.

"You've every excuse," replied Mr. Smith politely. "You've just taken over, haven't you. The old laird died quite recently — and I didn't hear about it till after the poor old chap's funeral. You see, we're not in the way of getting news up there in the hills. Have you been here long—that is more than a day or two?"

"Oh, about a week or thereabout. But please sit down. Cigarette?"

"Thank you." He dropped into the arm-chair. "I only heard quite casually yesterday that a new laird had turned up, and I decided to come down and make his acquaintance. I hope I haven't pushed along too soon? I mean, before you're settled in the Hall and so forth?"

"Not at all; I'm delighted. I was coming round one of these days to look at Black Edge and other little bits of property in any case."

SMITH APOLOGIZES

"Well, now that's just the point," said Mr. Smith, flicking the ash from his cigarette. "I've come to offer you a very humble apology. His large brown eyes looked at me in mingled amusement and concern. I could not but wonder what on earth was coming, but I met his gaze unmoved as he continued: "At least, I concluded afterward it must be you to whom I owe it. A man came to Black Edge yesterday and his reception was, to put it mildly, preposterously rude. I was very upset about it when I heard. Was it you, by any chance?"

"As a matter of fact," I replied, "it was. I went for a long walk up in the hills before lunch, and when I saw some farm buildings I wondered whether it was Black Edge. I didn't have a map, so for curiosity I thought I'd go in and inquire."

"My dear fellow," said Mr. Smith jumping to his feet, "I don't know how to tell you how vexed I am. I was positive it was you. Please let me explain. You mustn't think too harshly of us. It's all that fool of a servant's fault. He's got less brains than the average horse, but is really as loyal to me as it's possible to be. My health's bad and I've got to travel a lot, and I picked Josef up in a little Bavarian town just after the war. He was down and out, and has stuck to me like a leech ever since as a valet. The rest, quite simple—I'm an unsociable sort of cuss and I hate tramps and pickpockets poking around, and told the fellow so. I've had twice before to reprimand Josef for being downright rude to people, but I can promise you I took a stick to his back when I heard what had happened. The fellow has crawled about, afraid to look at me since yesterday—he's scared I will fling him out into the cold hard world. I can only repeat how unaccountably sorry I am. The next time you come to Black Edge I promise that your reception will be more—ah! we say—suited to a laird!"

"It's quite all right," I answered. "Don't let the thing worry you any more. I fumed at the time, of course, and thought of dropping you a note. But as I was coming shortly with my factor, I decided to mention the matter to you personally. Your servant is certainly a dangerous sort of beggar to let loose on people."

"More than that!" exclaimed Mr. Smith. "The fool Josef has lost my dog. You saw it, didn't you? A beauty. A valuable dog, too, but I don't mind that so much. The man says the brute got loose and made after you, and it never came back. I thought perhaps you might be able to throw some light on it."

"My heart was beating a fine tattoo, but with an effort of will I kept my composure. "The dog came after me right enough," I answered, "but it disappeared in the mist."

Mr. Smith ran his fingers through his gray hair. "I thought so," he said despondently. "It's gone over into that gorge. The mist was dreadful yesterday. Mr. Drysdale, you mustn't think me a bloodthirsty brute when I say I'd as soon that man of mine had gone over as Caesar!" His eyes were troubled and I could see the man was upset if he only knew the truth, I reflected, how different his attitude toward myself would be! "I must get Josef to keep an eye on the stream. It's deep and black at the bottom of that gorge, nothing has an earthly chance that goes over there. Down at the water's edge the rocks are steep and slippery. Poor old Caesar!"

"It's rotten hard luck," I murmured, feeling a cad in my inmost soul. "I'll fly that fellow alive," said Smith between his teeth. "But there! We won't talk about that any more. Now to show you forgive us for that appalling reception yesterday, Mr. Drysdale, I wonder if you'd care to lunch with me one day."

I said I would be charmed and his face lit up.

"Make it soon—tomorrow," he exclaimed. "Better still, come to dinner about 7 and we'll have a decent evening. You can come by road—you motor, I suppose?"

"I'll come in the two-seater," I nodded. "It belongs to a pal of mine."

"But pray bring him with you," pressed Mr. Smith.

"He's away at present, thanks, or I dare say he'd have been glad. Is the road all right?"

"Passable. You may go along the main road and take the first on the left. It goes right up into the hills. There's a gate on your right just before it dips into the valley. You recall the gate?"

"I'll find the way," I assured him. Mr. Smith, rising, "I'm delighted you can come. I'm a solitary sort of devil, Mr. Drysdale, but it's pleasant to have a real long chat about things now and then."

"Do you know a man called Seymour?" I asked boldly and awaited his answer with eagerness "Seymour?" Yes. He lives round about here somewhere. I know him slightly. He knocks about doing water colors."
