No, Mr. Brown
 By Gertrude Knevels

"I wouldn't worry about your old girls," Bill said comfortingly. "Something tells me they're going to locked out for."

"You think so?" April cried. "Then do you—oh, here's Gwenn. Perhaps she can tell us something about this mysterious Bureau benefactor."

Yesterday at the Bureau things had reached the stage when good news could not much longer be suppressed. Gwenn knew that Bill Brown's masquerade was nearly over, that Fairmount's benefactor—the new "angel" of Charity Square—could walk no longer unaware. Now, more suddenly than Bill expected, reporters, trustees, and committee heads were descending upon him. Towards the end of a frantic morning, Gwenn lured the young man into her office.

It was just Gwenn's fancy she said in her sweetest tones, to be the first girl in Fairmount to thank Bill in the name of her town. Gwenn wanted Bill to know one girl in town didn't care a whoop about his money. Gwenn liked Bill for being Bill. Did he know how much she cared? Didn't he understand?

With her jaquered head against his shoulder, arms slipped round his neck, lips pressed suddenly shamelessly to his, Bill was forced to understand. A moment Bill held Gwenn, then he sat her down hard on her chair, dealt her straight-from-the-shoulder talk. Unfortunately, Gwenn could not take it. She made the mistake of tears—a near approach to hysteria, of which Bill took advantage. He fetched a cup of ice water, some of which he spilled down Gwenn's neck. Gwenn went home in a rage. He greeted her now cheerfully but warily.

"Gwenn," April exclaimed, "isn't this grand news about the Bureau?"

Gwenn had gathered from Bill's unhappy expression that April was still uninformed on certain matters. "Well, Bill," she sneered, "how does it feel now your cat's out of the bag? Too bad, though, when you were so keen on keeping the girls from finding out."

"Finding out what?" April stared innocently. She wondered what made Bill grow so red and look so furious. A crowd of people advanced on him round the curve of the corridor. Doctor Hasnet, Chief of Staff—Miss Lister, Superintendent of Nurses—Alix Van Elden—being shown over the institution, and a couple of visiting doctors. Miss Lister pounced on Bill with a squeal of delight.

"Here he is now, our Town Angel! Gentlemen, this is the donor of our new Day camp, Mr. Brown, Doctor Tilden—Doctor Hunt. These gentlemen are tuberculosis specialists, Mr. Brown, so naturally they are particularly interested in your idea."

The crowd enveloped Bill and drew him along with them down the corridor. "Bill?" April gasped, "Bill, giving us the Day camp?"

"And all the rest of it," Gwenn yelled. "His father was Brown, the steel man—didn't you ever hear of him? He left Bill a pot of money to divide among Fairmount charities, as well as a few millions over for herself. He took that E. R. A. job to get experience and study the town. Bill's leaving now as soon as he can. He says he's really rather enjoyed this funny little place, but he's naturally dreading the rush."

CHAPTER XXX
 "April's not home," Mrs. Bundy announced. "But you come right on in, Mr. Brown. You're just the feller we want to see."

Polly treated Bill to her amiable smile, then, going to the back stairs she called, "Zory, Mr. Brown's here! Bring it down." To Bill she explained, "Zory and me
