JUST A GIRL

BY JANE PHELPS

AN AWAKENED INTEREST IN BUSINESS

CHAPTER 97.

I wrote Mother a long cheerful letter, telling her of my new position, of Mr. Claxton's kindness, and all about the people in the office.

"Tell Aunt Susan that perhaps some day I may be able to pay that young writer's board bill for him in turn for his typewriter." I also added that now I had found his work. I had greater hope than ever that some day I might make a ... If only I could earn enough to have just three or four rooms, and Mother to keep house for me, it would be like Heaven.. I said nothing of this to Mary. She was planning a home for me with them, a home I should enjoy, but still not like the one I had in my mind for Mother and myself.

Miss Baker seemed not to get over her resentment becasue I refused her invitation to lunch at the same place she, and the girls she knew, frequented each day. I was sorry simply ecause I hated to have anyone feel unkindly toward me for such a reason. Yet at the same time I did not want to go with her.

I often caught her and Mr. Betts, the manager, whispering and glancing in my direction. They seemed very intimate, and my first impression, that they were interested in each other—anyway, that Miss Baker was intrigued with him—was strengthened by what I saw.

I was often embarassed and annoyed by their evident interest in where and what I did. But when I talked with Mary, she insisted Miss Balker was jealous because of something.

There was much that happened however to offset any unpleasantness caused by her. Mr. Claxton assured me I was improving so fast that it would not be long before I could assume the same position Miss Lee had held—practically that of private secretary.

Oh, how I worked after he told me that. I begrudged the time I spent eating and sleeping. I worked constantly, feverishly, always with that thought before me. After my experience in working for others—even for myself in a public place—the thought of the seclusion of a private office appealed strongly to me.

At first I had no slightest interest in the business as a business, but now I had commenced to read the financial news, to listen when securities and their values were discussed. I had begun to realize that if I were to hold a position of trust, I must familiarize myself with the business of the firm, the terms used, and many other things that up to now had seemed of minor or of no importance.

I believe there is no truer saying than "To be busy is to be happy." I know I was happier than I had been since Dad died—happier even than when Mary and I first started our little pancake shop. Even though we were our own mistresses there, often I felt uncomfortable, because of the tippings, or the actions of some of the people I served. So far, here I had had nothing but kindness—unless I considered Miss Baker's actions, which really amounted to nothing by comparison.

One day Mr. Claxton spoke of a security, said he wished he knew something about it. I happened to have read about that very thing, and told him so, explaining where I had found my information. He looked surprised and pleased. He complimented me highly, then made the somewhat cryptic remark: "I knew I was making no mistake." But as it seemed to be addressed to himself, not to me, I could only guess at what he implied.

Occasionally after this incident he brought me something to read, usually something connected with large corporations, of securities of some kind in which the firm were particularly interested or which they were underwriting.

Frequently he would question me about what I read, and if I seemed hazy on any point, and unable to grasp the meaning or explain it, he would patiently go over it with me until it was perfectly clear.

Often I wondered why there was so much said against employers and the manner in which they treated their employees, and so little said in their favor. In this office it seemed that courtesy and consideration were given as freely as it was expected—more freely, in fact.

Even Mr. Betts, who, for some unknown reason, I felt disliked me, was uniformly polite. That the time would come when he would not be and would even make things unpleasant and so hard for me that I could scarcely endure it, I could not imagine.

Suavity often covers an unkind heart.

Hints for the Motorist

BY ALBERT L. CLOUGH

THE BADLY FITTED PISTON

Expensive To Correct, But More Expensive To Tolerate

One thing that is absolutely fatal to the successful operation of a car is the presence of ill fitting pistons and this includes the fitting of the rings as well as of the pistons themselves. In the hurry of quantity production, not a few cars are put into service with this initial defect and fail to give good results until it is corrected, but as a rule, loose and leaky pistons develop only after long usage or after a failure of cylinder lubrication which has resulted in the scratching of "scoring" of cylinder walls and pistons and perhaps the breakage of rings. A single failure of engine lubrication may work more harm as to piston fit than years of normal operation and it is especially to be guarded against with the fuel now in use. The first indication of faulty piston fit is very often the oil-fouling of spark-plugs which, if it develops suddenly, without any change having be... made in lubricating conditions, is a fairly sure sign that piston-rings or even pistons and cylinder bores require attention. If a cylinder will not tightly retain its charge of gas, when it is hand-cranked through its compression stroke and both inlet and exhaust valve are known to be tight, it is proof positive that the charge leaks past the piston-ring and piston, assuming that there is no leak at the spark-plug or around the head gasket. The leaky piston results in diminished power, waste of fuel and oil, rapid carbonization and ultimately in noisy and uneven engine operation. A cylinder with a leaky piston loses much of its charge before it is fired and the explosion pressure upon the piston is thus greatly reduced, with a corresponding reduction of power. The escaped fuel is worse than lost, for it enters the crank-case and thins the oil, while the oil that passes the leaky rings forms deposits on the piston heads and elsewhere. After piston and cylinder wear has gone sufficiently far, enough looseness is developed so that the piston, instead of running smoothly, "cocks up" in the cylinder bore, striking its upper and lower edges against it and producing the peculiar rattling knock, known as "piston slap," which in most engines, is pronounced when they are suddenly accelerated.

MRS. JOHN GRIGG

It is with feelings of deepest regret we record the death of Lavinia Gorrill, beloved wife of John Grigg and daughter of the late Richard Gorrill and Mary Ann Newcombe, Northam, which occurred at her home in Tyne Valley July 17, 1920, at the age of 61 years. Death was caused by heart failure and other ailments. She bore her illness with calm and patient endurance until the end. Although her many friends, both old and young, cannot help mourning over the departure of one so kind and gentle in her own home, and with those whom she met outside her own family circle, they rejoice to know that all through her illness she was ever submitting to her Heavenly Father's will and when He sent His messenger to call her home she was willing to go fully trusting in Christ as her Saviour.

All that loving care and tender nursing could do was done to prolong her life but the Heavenly Father saw otherwise and claimed her for His own. Sunday afternoon at two o'clock after a short service at the house, the remains were conveyed to the Methodist Church, Bedeford, being followed by a large number of carriages and automobiles.

The funeral service was conducted by Rev. F. W. Sawdon, who visited her during her illness assisted by Rev. W. Auld of Tyne Valley, and Rev. H. Millar of New Brunswick. She leaves to mourn a sorrowing husband and three sons and seven daughters, namely: Wm. Springhill, Lot 13 Thos., Poplar Grove, Earnest at home, Mrs. P. MacAull, Mount Pelasant Mrs. E. MacNevin, Ellerslie; Mrs. B. MacDonald, Bideford; Mrs. I Ramsay Arlington, Reby, Belle and Wanda at home. A step-mother Mrs. R. Gorrill, Northam, four sisters Mrs. H. Ellis, Northam; Mrs. W. MacLellan, Newtonville Mass.; Mrs. F. Millar and Priscilla Gorrill, Newton, Mass. Four brothers, Henry of Northam, Frederick of East Boston, John of Minneapolis, Reuben of Spokane, Wash., also 18 grandchildren. The pall bearers were: Jobez Williams, Laughlin MacNevin, Robert Ramsay, John Strongman, Edward Williams, and ... Millar.
