The HOUSEWIFE and HER ACTIVITIES

LEGACIES
Unto my friends I give my thoughts,
Unto my God my soul,
Unto my foe I leave my love—
These are of life the whole.

NEAT AND TRIM
Get into the habit of being immaculate from head to feet. A daily bath, fresh underwear and stockings every morning, suits and dresses clean and carefully pressed, use of deodorants—these things are most important.

Perhaps few children actually say "I seem" today, but the number who are really ungrammatical, if not illiterate, is appalling.

What Is An Ideal Husband? Dorothy Dix Says the "Animal" Does Not Exist

Women Really Would Not Be Satisfied With a Perfect Husband, for They Would Have Nothing About Which to Find Fault

A group of young girls ask me to define for them the ideal husband. Well, my little dears, there isn't such an animal extant.

No. There is no perfect husband. If there were, no wife could stand him. Being married to a brute would simply be a picnic compared to being married to a paragon.

Of course, in her moments of matrimonial peevishness every wife dreams of the ideal husband but, in reality, she doesn't want him and wouldn't have him on a bet.

But while conceding that no girl need be alarmed at the prospect of getting a perfect husband, since she is no more likely to find one camped on her doorstep than a megatherium reposing there, still and all there are certain qualities that make a man desirable as a life partner.

Yet another qualification for a good husband is generosity. This goes both for money and his attitude toward his wife.

Marchand never sent me a red-head before," he said. The lid's off tonight.

A Morning Smile

"Yes, my dear," said a very modern wife to a friend, "for months I wondered where my husband was spending his evenings, until one night I arrived home early—and there he was!"

IN LIGHTER VEIN

The lights had gone out in the bus, and the tall man asked the lady, who had got on at the last stop, if he could help her find a strap.

"I've already found one," she said. "Then would you mind letting go of my necktie?"

Drinking coffee, Chris asked, "Well, how was it, Mr. Wick?"

"I'm going back to my hotel and sleep a week."

"Please don't," said Gay, putting butter on toast.

"Oh, you mean the order! I'll take care of that." He looked at her. "You're too nice a girl to have your kind of job."

On the way home in a cab Gay fell asleep. Chris put his arm around her and put her head on his shoulder.

"Where is this guy?" Chris asked. He wants a good time. Okay. We'll show it to him. I know spots he's never been in.

"With you along I won't be so scared," Chris said.

"Don't say it. I'll get you out of this jam but I didn't want to see you again."

She introduced the men. Chris said, "Gay's been telling me your evening's been a kind of washout."

Mr. Wick. She's new to this business, enjoying yourself. So I volunteered my services. I've covered every corner of this town and I know places. If you don't object to a third party, we'll make a night of it. What do you say?

You aren't going to hold it against a girl who hasn't been around..."

Wick cleared his throat. "I'm sorry. I didn't know it was like that, Miss Van Avery. I'm sorry, indeed."

She put her arm through Chris's. She said, "Hold onto me, Chris—tight—and don't let me out of your sight."

Never in her life did she dance so much; never in her life did she feel that she was dancing above the world. The evening was a series of cabs and a series of places—from night clubs where society danced and drank and the price of the orchestra ran into four figures, to water-front restaurants where sailors and freighter captains drank beer and had the horizons of far-off places in their wise eyes.

To Gay's astonishment, John Wick became a jovial man who left the responsibility of a large store and a large family in his home city on his annual visit to New York.

Musie, and Chris holding her... Chris's dark eyes that gave messages his lips would not say. Gay felt intoxicated with the music and the strongest arms that had ever held her.

The green chiffon dress was crushed, the gardenias had withered, and her red curls had the dampness of the dawn on them when they went to a well-known mid-town restaurant for ham and eggs when the first bright colors of dawn streaked the sky over tall buildings.

THE COOK'S CORNER

LAMB STEW TASTY

Wherever you go, lamb stew is a favorite kind, because of its delicious flavor. Lamb may be combined with practically any vegetables, those available in mid-winter and early spring as well as the fresh green vegetables of the warmer months. So Inez S. Wilson, home economist, suggests that you serve lamb stew frequently. The shoulder, breast, shank or neck of lamb are the usual cuts chosen for stew. These are economical and at the same time, they are chock full of flavor. Have these boned and cut into pieces of the size desired. If the stew is to be arranged on a platter for serving, the pieces should be good-sized, one to two inches in size. These may be dredged with flour and browned in hot lard, then covered with hot water, and allowed to cook slowly until done. The vegetables should be added to the stew just long enough before serving so they will be done not overcooked. Mid-winter vegetables which are particularly good in lamb stew are potatoes, turnips, carrots, cabbage quarters, rutabaga, onions and canned vegetables such as green beans and peas.

LOBSTER PIE

Line a baking dish with cold boiled rice, or hominy, or mashed white or sweet potatoes, to the depth of one-half an inch, bottom and sides. Place in this shell the flesh of a two-pound lobster, cut in cubes. Thicken one pint of hot fish stock, milk, water, or a mixture of two or more of these with three tablespoons of flour rubbed smooth with two or three tablespoons of softened butter, season with one teaspoon of salt and one-half a teaspoon of tabasco, or a few grains of cayenne, or one or two tablespoons of chopped sweet pepper, and stir over fire until the mixture boils. Pour this over the lobster, and pile over the top as many sliced tomatoes as there is room for. Sprinkle the lobster with two tablespoons of fine granulated sugar mixed with one-fourth a teaspoon of pepper, and bake the whole for one-half an hour.

We'll Meet Again

By MARGARET GORMAN NICHOLS

"I miss his busy typewriter and Sandy's gleeful bark," said Diana. "Chris! In those few weeks of readjustment he had given her so much to remember! Gay felt a tingling ache in her. The night he had kissed her, a tender passionate kiss. The night he had put his lips in the palm of her hand and she had wanted to cry because it had touched her so! Now he was gone, leaving her to look for him on the street and in restaurants to look for the sight of his disheveled black hair and those dark eyes of his, tender one moment, unsmiling the next. Because the evenings were lonely without Chris, she went to see Penny one evening and found her curled up on the studio bed like a sleepy child, her eyes wistful and hurt, listening to Mac Bolton. "Oh, Gay, come in," said Penny. You know Mac. He's been telling me the romantic escapades of an aviator. She smiled sweetly at Mac. "What was he saying?" "I said she was a society girl," said Mac, drawing on his pipe, and she meets me at the airport in a snappy roadster every time I get in. Penny's face did not change. And Gay wondered, pulling off her gloves from her cold numb hands, how Penny could sit there, loving him, and never show how deeply she was hurt or how jealous she was when he talked of other girls. Penny had said, "My world is in him." But Mac's world was in an exciting world of air records clipped and girls in every city who waited for him to bring his plane down. Still he came back to Penny to sit in her cozy studio and talk about himself. Always about himself. And when he left her love but her faith went with him. When Mac left, Penny said, "For months I don't see him when he's serious about another girl. Then he comes back to me because something has disappointed or hurt him." She smiled, running her fingers through her short dark hair. "I always take him back. Sometimes his superiors have reproached him or he wants to borrow money or a girl he thought was an angle, figured out to be a shrew. When I see him standing in the doorway, I forget the resolutions I've made. I love him so much," Penny said earnestly. Marchand called her to the office one evening about closing time. She looked tired. Sleep did not come quickly these nights. "You've been with us several weeks, let us call it. Tonight I want you to go out with the buyer from one of the largest stores in the South and show him a good time. John Wick isn't a bad chap but he likes to have a good time." He smiled. "I shouldn't have to tell you where to take him."

INSTALLMENTS

"Is Mr. Wick married?" Gay asked. Marchand blinked impatiently. "Of course he's married. They're always married." "I've never been out with a married man." Picking up a pencil, he tapped it against his desk. "I want his order. You understand that, don't you? If I don't get it..." Gay got up. Her lashes hid her eyes. "I'll do my best." Evening clothes. Look your best. You can wear anything in the shop, and he told her at what hotel to meet John Wick and at what time. She selected a green chiffon dress and a silver coat, and dressed in the dressing room of the store. When she came out and gave a cab driver the address of the hotel, she was shivering. Oh, let him be understanding! Let him be nice! What would her father say if he knew she were selling a part of her soul, cheapening herself, degrading herself, to keep her and her mother from charity or the pity of their friends? John Wick, a big florid man with merry eyes and deep laughter, found her in the lobby. He took her arm and led her to the dining room.
