Chapter 50

But Dick's persistence obtained its reward at last, as the plate of sandwiches was eaten and the coffee had been drunk. Mrs. Talbot carried off the dishes to wash in the kitchen, and Amy let Dick stay with her in the living room. Strange to say, these late evening feasts had no effect upon this healthy girl, she could drink hot coffee at any hour of the night, and still go peacefully to sleep the moment she touched her pillow. It was Mrs. Talbot who had to be careful.

"I don't want you to be a domestic sort of wife," Dick began, anxious to remove the bad impression he felt he had created. "I don't want to see you work. You know that. I used to hate seeing you wash windows and cut grass and such things at home."

"You never thought of anything about it," Amy answered, quite truthfully. "You had always seen girls work and women work, and you just took it for granted that all of them did the jobs I was doing. You never even thought about me, except that I had red hair and you hated the color."

There was a silence, while Dick searched for an excuse for a remark which was in fact perfectly true. Dick always took a little time to answer but when he did, slowly and thoughtfully, his answer was to the point.

"I was an awful fool then; I wasn't in love with you," he began, the two statements coming out as one sentence, so closely were they connected in his mind. "I don't see how I could have helped but be in love with you, even then, but I wasn't I am now—and it makes everything different."

"I adore red hair." This was a sensational statement from Dick. "But if you marry me, you won't have to work. They're training me for the assistant management of our department. I'll get it when I know a little more Spanish." Dick catching the fever of work, had been taking night courses in languages and export trade. "That pays $30 a week. And that's only the beginning."

The boy's slow, quiet way of talking carried conviction, even to the perverse girl. It was this same convincing trick of speech that had influenced the men of the firm who worked for, and that had gained him this recent promotion.

"We'll be married when I'm making $50," Dick when on. "You can have a fairly nice flat for that and a maid, so you won't have to work. Even if I don't make money, I'll be rich some day. I know it. But it would be fun to start poor, with a little place—and to have you looking after things at home."

His eyes were glowing at the idea. But Amy was untouched. "It would be wonderful—if we were in love with you that way, Dickie," she said, her own tones serious for a moment. "But I'm not. You have a certain sweet girl in mind, and you want to marry her, but I'm not the girl. You don't love me with me. You only think so."

Dick's short laugh was a most effective denial.

"You don't know me at all. You say you'll be rich—but you don't know my ideas of being rich. You don't know how fearfully, terribly extravagant I want to be! I want not a flat nor a house, but lots of houses, and motors, and jewels, and gowns—the wonderful sort of gowns that look so simple the ordinary person doesn't notice them, but that cost fortunes! I want heaps of people to dinner, all the biggest people of the day, and parties and dinners, and long trips—I want a lot." She turned her face toward Dick, her features alive with anticipation as she lived for an instant in the world she had built for her self.

"You couldn't give all that, not until we were both too old to get much fun out of it," she went on. "If I were in love with you unselfishly, as you are with me, this other wouldn't count, and I should adore trying on gingham aprons and making Sunday night supper when the maid went out."

"As it is, I have to marry a rich man. Or else, I have to make a name for myself as a singer, so all these people will invite me places, and I can live the sort of life I want as a guest of people who have money."

She paused, leaning back in her usual position in the big chair and surveying her victim with a certain humorous sympathy. "Dick seemed to sink lower on the couch as his spirits went down."

"So you see, I'm just hard and selfish to the core. I'm simply a good sport about it, and perfectly honest, as I would if I married you. I'll leave you free for some other girl, who is nicer than I am."

SYNOPSIS

At a first night performance in New York a beautiful young woman attracts attention by rising and leisurely surveying the audience through her glasses. Clavering, a newspaper columnist, and his cousin, Dinwiddie, are particularly interested. Dinwiddie declaring she is the image of Mary Ogden, a belle of thirty years ago, who had married a Count Zattiany. He is convinced that this is Mary's daughter, but all efforts to establish her identity prove futile.

Clavering finally manages to meet her and she tells him she is the Countess Josef Zattiany, a cousin of Mary Ogden's and had married a relative of Mary's husband. Clavering does not believe her story and tells her so.

As time goes on Clavering realizes that he is in love with the mysterious Madame Zattiany, the first name he learns, is Mary. He declares his passion and draws from her the admission of a reciprocal warmth of feeling.

Mrs. Ogden, having offered her box, Clavering invites Mary to attend the opera with him one evening. He is disappointed when she declines to go, but she appears in the Ogden box, regally gowned and the cynosure of all eyes, is something that forbidding Society which had questioned her credentials, and clear up the mystery. She promises Clavering she will reveal her secret to him the following Saturday night.

"I think that for women of my type—what may be called the intellectual siren—the lover phase is inevitable. We are goaded not only by the imperious demands of the perfect companion, but by curiosity, love of adventure, ennui; possibly some more obscure complex—vengeance on the husband who has wrecked our first illusions—on Life itself. Bringing up, family and social traditions, have nothing to do with it. Only opportunity counts. Moreover, we are not the product of our immediate forebears, but of a thousand thousands unknown ancestors."

"God! True enough!"

"Unfortunately, these women who have wasted so much time on love never realize the tragic fulfillment of their own self-devised temptation; and then it is too late for anything but regrets of another sort. The war may have solved the problem for many a desperate spirit."

"My own case has assumed an entirely different complexion. With my youth restored I have the world at my feet once more, but safeguarded by the wisdom of experience—in so far as a mortal ever may be. The bare idea of that old game of prowling sex fills me with ennui and disgust. The body may be young again, but my mind, re-nourished through it, is packed with memories of a very Book of Life. When I found that my beauty was restored I thought of nothing less than returning to the conquest of men in the old manner, although quite aware of its powerful aid in the work I have made up my mind to do in Austria. Of late, of course, I have thought of little else but what this remarkable change of my youth means to you and to myself. But—please do not interrupt—this I shall not discuss with you again until Monday—if then."

"I'm going to try to get what I want. I'm willing to work hard for it—either by trying to be a great singer, or a decent wife to which ever way I marry, I'll be that anyway—a good sport."

An understone to tragedy was in her voice. Dick said nothing, but got up. Amy thought he was going, and rose, too. His answer was simply to put his arms around her and kiss her—to kiss her with a fire and longing that left her helpless with astonishment.

"Don't do that, Dick," she begged, frightened at herself and at him. "Don't—don't make it hard to do."
