The Mystery of The Singing Walls

As he started to turn away, his searching eyes saw the blood-stained bandage hanging by the old gentleman's side. Bending over he raised the wrist, unrolled the gauze and examined the stump critically.

"What is this?" he inquired.

"What has happened to his fingers?"

"When I found him, it had been cut off just as you see it, below the lower joint," John explained. "There was no sign of the cut-off end, however."

The physician shook his head thoughtfully and dexterously re-bandaged the mutilated member.

The physician hesitated, moved over to the sofa and stood looking down at his patient, fingering the fraternity key on his waistcoat.

"He's coming to," he concluded, bending over the writhing little figure and peering into the glaze-covered eyes. "Keep him quiet. He'll be himself once I get this hypodermic into him. I'll be right back."

For a moment after the physician's tall, distinguished form passed through the door into the hall, there was silence in the great room. Then the gurgling sound began again and gradually assumed the form of words, among which—"Osborn"—"Osborn"—"Help"—could be distinguished.

Then, John kept his eyes riveted on the little figure, whose iron will was fighting hard and whose hands kept clawing spasmodically at the sides of the divan. Why had
