The Wall Flower BY MARION RUBINCAM

A LITTLE GIRL Chapter 9

One o'clock in the morning is a dreary sort of time, and a bedroom furnished with discarded odds and ends of furniture on a hopelessly faded carpet is a dreary sort of place.

Dora huddled again the register, which she could not see faintly warm air from a heater long since banked for the night. She had wrapped a blanket around herself over her bathrobe, but that did not keep her entirely warm.

An ideal situation to write about, Dora thought. She is so bright and so like her father—I hope this isn't a bad sign.

Feb. 6. Jim went off today. He'll be a hobo now for months, until Peter is ready for spring plowing. I cried all day, after he left.

There was no entry until late March. Jim was back then, for it said "He looks well again. He cannot stand the cold weather, not Maude's and my nagging. He always must be free to do as he wants."

This was the most personal entry. The other items seemed to be dates of births, a list of presents, and other trifles.

Her mother had always called her Pan. But Aunt Maude disapproved of what she termed "a downright heathen name" and called the child Dora instead. And Dora she remained always.

Her mother had been a slender little woman with a heavy mass of straight brown hair which she wore parted in the centre and bound in thick braids around her head; or else made into a great knot at the nape of her neck and held with a coarse net. She had brown eyes that seemed much too large for her slender face, they almost stared from it—perhaps emphasized by the pallor of her skin.

Being lonely has so many advantages. I never thought about that before. I found it out today when I went for a walk to the top of Knob Hill and sat looking into the deserted stone quarry and the hill where they cut the trees, leaving only the stumps. I'm not the sort that makes friends, so I must go through life very much alone.

Other people fill their minds with thoughts about their friends—and their doings. I must fill mine with thoughts about imaginary friends.

"When I was a little girl, I played with made-up children from my books. I read 'Why can't I live now with made-up people?'"

Years later she added to this page in small writing to get it in. "I have tried this and it is successful. Philosophers say there is a little distinction between the world and the ideal man and the ideal woman."

She had tried this successfully for a long time now. She wondered whether she would ever meet real people as satisfying.

Miners Willing For Conference

NEW YORK, April 6.—John Lewis, president of the United Mine Workers, established a temporary strike headquarters in New York today to await the outcome of the House Labor Committee inviting the Bituminous coal operators to join the miners in a wage conference at Washington, D. C.

While awaiting further advice from the congressman Nolan, Chairman of the House Committee, Mr. Lewis announced he would attempt to hasten negotiations for a settlement of the Anthracite strike through the miners and operators sub-committee on wage contract.

Referring to reports from Washington that operators in Ohio and Indiana have already sent a telegram to Mr. Nolan, declining to meet the miners, Mr. Lewis said "I have not received any official notification that operators refused the invitation and I can only reaffirm our willingness to negotiate with them at any time."

Alterations to the features, by what is known as plastic surgery, were performed on women 2,000 years ago.
