—A gentleman of decided nautical tastes tempted by the gorgeous green that bordered the Bay Beautiful, in winter known as Bedque Bay, took his trim little nuptial launch on a spin up the Du-Rok. The day was beautiful; the water danced in the sunlight and the apt launch slid on the ripples like a thing of life. Up, up, up, up, under oars, skimming by grassy shores, darting over overhanging maps, the little skiff played hide and seek with the shadows till the utmost limit of navigation for a skiff was reached. The navigator was delighted, so was the weather, so were the crew that peeped slyly at him from the pool. But suddenly the weather changed. One of the squalls that have haunted the island during the summer turned its relentless breath upon the scene, transforming the summer glory into a dreary October chill. Sheltered under a semi-hostile bush, he watched the approaching gloom; the silvery stream became a muddy torrent; the impatient trout poked up their noses and grinned sardonically at him. Night was coming and the storm showed no signs of abating. There could be no fishing; nothing remained but to return and brave the raging elements. He touched the tiller lever that gave life to the launch and headed her down the river. But the launch, that had never before proved false showed that the evil spirit that was abroad had been tampering with her. Her machinery went wrong and kept working. Seeking a landing place he beached her and proceeded to investigate. There was nothing organic astray, but the voices of the woods, the howl of the storm, the merciless pelting of the rain seemed, each in a different key, to shout Row, Row, Row with a capital R. His eyes turned to the oars and he was soon tugging determinedly down the stream. But the evil spirit was not satisfied. Rocks bobbed up out of the depths. The launch struck fiercely and once, he thought she was punctured. Ever-hung was again tibia. There were rocks and shoals that had never been there before. Discouraged and disgusted he heaved her ashore. To say he was wet would be putting it mildly. Next day he walked around where his false-headed launch lay safely moored and brought her home, her machinery acting divinely, the waters dancing merrily and nothing suggesting the bitter experience of the previous day except recollections of the ghostly "choes calling" upon him to row, row, row.

—The power of faith has never been more pointedly demonstrated than it has recently in connection with the new water supply for Summerside. The unquestionable purity of this beverage has caused a decided run on the wells and water carriers from many homes make daily pilgrimages there with their piteous and pails. One gentleman in particular whose medical and scientific lore has placed him in the forefront of his profession, had a pall of it brought to his home every evening by his servant girl and he pointed with pride to its beneficial results upon his mental and physical system. It now transpires that the girl by way of economy, had been drawing her supply from the kitchen pump of a nearby friend upon whom she was in the habit of lining up occasionally on the walk to the well. Should her lord and master discover her duplicity it may cause a shrieking, but in doing this event the roundabout method of daily water-coat is a standing credential to the health-giving influence of the new water as well as the comparative harmlessness, under certain conditions, of the old supply.

—The death occurred at St. Eleanore yesterday at noon of Mrs. John Cheneau, after an illness of four months. Deceased was fifty five years of age, was highly respected and leaves four sons: George in Boston; Harry and Dr. E. —The power of faith has never been more pointedly demonstrated than it has recently in connection with the new water supply for Summerside. The unquestionable purity of this beverage has caused a decided run on the wells and water carriers from many homes make daily pilgrimages there with their piteous and pails. One gentleman in particular whose medical and scientific lore has placed him in the forefront of his profession, had a pall of it brought to his home every evening by his servant girl and he pointed with pride to its beneficial results upon his mental and physical system. It now transpires that the girl by way of economy, had been drawing her supply from the kitchen pump of a nearby friend upon whom she was in the habit of lining up occasionally on the walk to the well. Should her lord and master discover her duplicity it may cause a shrieking, but in doing this event the roundabout method of daily water-coat is a standing credential to the health-giving influence of the new water as well as the comparative harmlessness, under certain conditions, of the old supply.
