Gandier Advises Pledge Of Faith

TORONTO, May 17.—With the grave warning that the United Church of Canada was facing today the danger of serious reaction, and a challenge to the organization to stand firm against possible retrogression, Rev. Alfred Gandier, D.D., principal of Knox College, concluded his address before a gathering of the delegates to the Toronto Conference of the United Church Thursday night. Unless, he declared, the United Church of Canada was able to occupy the waste territories of this country, and to administer to the crying needs of its people, it had no right to its name. The clamor of the first year of union under the eyes of all Christendom, and with its spirit of determination had closed and the testing time had come. He was afraid of the thousands who were not accepting their responsibilities in the new church.

The Mystery Of The Singing Walls

As John's eyes swept in a semi-circle, they rested on the splintered, smashed drawer lying below the gleaming disk of the wide-winged safe door.

"He's got it," he muttered. "Watch out!"

From the left, behind him, came a rustle. In the big armchair before the Japanese figure, Beatrice Hammond was huddled. Her face was buried in her hands. She was sobbing convulsively.

"Open up the door for Busby, Graham snapped out.

John crossed the room and worked at the massive bolt, jammed over in place. Swinging the door wide, he looked into the hallway, followed by Anne Mason rushed in.

Graham had stepped over to the woodbox and thrown up the ornately carved cover. Immediately, the humming singing grew louder.

"Quick! Miss Mason," he urged. "How do you feel?"

The girl passed around beside the great fireplace. Her fingers were trembling as they pressed a button in the panel to the right. Instantly, the humming in the wall ceased.

Cautiously, the detective stuck one eye to the opening. The light shined and peered into the rectangular well below. Then, he jerked his head back.

"He's down there, he exclaimed. "This elevator goes slowly. He is only about halfway to the cellar. I could see the outline of the door, although I only took a quick look, for my head would be outlined against the light and he has a gun."

"You have him trapped then," Anne exclaimed breathlessly. The shaft is solid concrete right from the top to the bottom. If he should start half way down, there is no way of his escaping."

Busby wiped his forehead with his handkerchief.

"But I can't understand it," he muttered. "How could he be in that wood elevator when at the time we examined it a while back, the box was chockfull of logs?"

"After we left Burke and I were outside watching the entrance," John explained, "our man probably went to the cellar, got the button, and brought down the floor of the woodbox. Then he rolled the logs off himself, came up here, sprang on Burke from behind and killed him. (The reason that, later, we didn't notice that the cover was down.)"

"The captain eyed the engineer quizzically and shook his head. "But how did he get up here this time?" he persisted.

"He attacked Jim as he was coming in to lit the stove," Graham suggested, "grabbed the chisel from him, jumped in the car and went down to the cellar. Then he hopped on the wood elevator and came up to the study while we were at tending to Jim. You remember hearing the singing in the study when we brought in the cage with Jim in it. Well, that was him going up to the study."

"Mrs Hammond then locked the study doors, and he was making his get-away down the wood elevator when we burst in."

"Why didn't you call us, Mrs. Hammond?"

Busby crossed over before the crumpled figure in the armchair.

"The woman lay curled up, sobbing as if her heart would break, giving no sign of hearing the detective's question.

"Who is down there?" the officer repeated sternly. "Your husband or your brother?"

"Still, she did not answer, her eyes closed, biting her knuckles. "Never mind. We'll find out, all right," Graham said. "Which button brings up, Miss Mason?"

"The white one," Anne explained reaching for the switch.

"With a rush, John grabbed her hand.

"Don't do that," he warned. "We must get Mrs. Hammond and you in safety, and ourselves all set before we tackle him."

The girl hesitated, then turned toward the figure huddled in the armchair.

"Come, Beatrice," she said gently, "and be careful, John."

"Quick, please, Mrs. Hammond," the engineer urged more kindly, as the shaken woman staggered to her feet and started for the door. Suddenly she stopped and stood hunched over, her face pale, her eyes fixed on the floor.

"Don't hurt him," she cried, a note of agony in her voice. "It wasn't his fault. You mustn't hurt him."

"Please, Mrs Hammond," Graham gripped her by the arm. "Don't make it hard for me. You must go. All at once she wrenched herself free and started towards the woodbox.

"I won't go," she shrieked. "Don't hurt him. You shan't hurt him."

Blocking her way, Busby gripped her around the waist. Holding her before him, he forced her struggling toward the door and out into the hall. Then, stepping back quickly he slammed shut the massive panel and shot the bolt.

"Now, men, get over behind that divider," he said to each of the officers. "Keep your eyes fixed on that box. I am going to stand here between it and the fireplace. When I press the button and the floor comes up, watch out. And if he resists let him have it. Don't forget. Be quick and shoot at the slightest move he makes."

Firmly the detective pressed the white button on the brass switch. Again the humming singing recommenced.

"Remember! If he makes any false move shoot!" Graham warned.

"Like a rat in a cage the rising prison was hoisting the man from below. Just under their feet, above the soft singing of the walls, sounded a metallic clink of a revolver hammer.

"Now, men," Graham warned,

"Here, you fellows, help me hoist him up on the sofa."

As the three men lifted the dazed form and stretched him full-length, Beatrice Hammond slipped in at the physician's battered waist, raised the iron-gray hair tenderly on her lap. All the while she was sobbing steadily, like a bruised child.

For a moment the captain cast a piercing glance, and he eyed Graham with a quizzical raise of his brows. In the latter's eyes was a look of pity as he watched the woman.

"I was sorry not to have helped more, but I was afraid to let him in it. Busby apologized in a low voice to his colleague. "He was fighting for all there was in him, and you two were rolling around so I didn't get a chance to soak him. But, my God, Graham, would have figured that our man was Darnell? It doesn't seem possible."

"I have thought so for a long time," Graham admitted. "That knife we found was a surgical knife, and this logically pointed to Darnell. Also, he did many suspicious things, such as denying Mr. Hammond the chisel, shooting morphine when it was obvious that he was under the influence of that narcotic. Also, he was always around when anything happened."

"But why did he kill Uncle Charles?" Anne said, wondering.

"The detective shook his head. "Perhaps this lady can help us. Mrs. Hammond, why did Dr. Darnell murder your uncle?"

The woman looked at him with the expression of a hunted animal in her eyes.

"Murder!" she repeated. "Murder! Oh, God, no! Not that."

From out in the hall, Royce, Hughes and Brady crowded into the room.

"It's all right, boys, our chase is ended," the captain explained. "We've got our man. He's been critically the physician, whose lids were fluttering now and then with returning consciousness.

"He seems pretty well knocked out," Royce commented. "Do you want us any more?"

"No, we can handle him," Busby answered. "Station some of the boys outside the doors here and don't let anybody in. We want to grill this fellow when his senses come back and we don't want to be disturbed."

"How about the crowd in that room downstairs?" Royce asked. "O'Rourke is watching 'em."

"Let them out," Graham advised. "Only don't let them leave the house. Keep to yourselves what's happened up here. We don't want to be interrupted."

"He's coming to," John exclaimed as the detectives again filed from the room.

The man on the sofa was writhing and twisting, groaning to himself and endeavoring to reach with his right hand the bruise on his temple. Supporting his aristocratic iron-gray head, Beatrice Hammond was crying softly, swallowing now and then with a choking gulping. Every once and again she would murmur: "Oh, God—Why—Oh, God—Why?"

For a time the group around the sofa stood in a half circle, looking in silence on the unconscious figure who was fighting to regain connection with reality.
