Alarm Expressed At Increase in Sects

HALIFAX, Sept. 17 — (CP) — The Church of England in Canada feels "some alarm" at the increase in numbers of the Pentecostal and other holiness sects, including Jehovah's Witnesses and Seventh Day Adventists, the church's committee of statistics and state of the church reported tonight.

The report, tabled before the 17th General Synod of the church, said "analysis of the census of 1941 shows that their numbers did not undoubtedly double during the period 1931-41."

"Their main strength is in Ontario—97,000—and the four western provinces—93,000. They comprise about 1.75 per cent of the total population.

"Of their zeal and devotion there can be no question...one and all have an intense yearning for the spiritual life but they need to be shown 'the more excellent way.'"

The report said the Church of England should "not ignore but rather woo and welcome these struggling souls."

The Bishops' report, given as part of the committee statement, said increases were noted "in almost every section."

"The number of church members is 100,000 more than ever before. There was an increase of 50,000 in each of the years 1947 and 1948."

CHAPTER XXIX

Eleanor's hands dropped. For a moment there was blank silence between them. Then she demanded, "Isn't there anybody in the world—Kester, there must be somebody!"

"That's what he wanted to ask me," Dr. Renshaw is one of the finest ophthalmologists in America. He's on the telephone now, long-distance, a man in Chicago and one in Baltimore. What he wanted to ask me was whether we could afford it."

"Was that all?" Eleanor exclaimed. "Did you tell him it doesn't matter what the consultation costs? That we can afford anything she needs?"

"Yes," said Kester, "I told him that. He put his hand on her shoulder. She jerked up at him. 'I'm sorry, Eleanor,' he said earnestly.

Kester was looking at her intently. What he might have said had there been time enough she could not tell, for Cornelia's nurse came into the room.

Kester did not know it then, but Eleanor always believed it was his strength and not her own that saved her from collapse through the period that ended one February morning when she heard a knock at her door, and before she could answer it Kester burst in exclaiming, "Eleanor! They say Cornelia's better!"

For an instant Eleanor was as if stunned. Her joy was too great for her to comprehend it at once. She gasped, "They say—?"

"Dr. Renshaw. He's just told me they believe they've arrested the ophthalmist. He waited a moment, then persisted in pushing the knowledge into her mind, 'Don't you understand? She can see!'"

"How soon can we go to her?" Eleanor asked.

"In about an hour. They're being making some tests. Miss Crouzet will call us."

Cornelia was sitting up, listening to a story the nurse was reciting aloud. They took chairs facing her. Kester and Eleanor looked at Cornelia, and after a moment they looked at each other, incredulously. They were a quarter of an inch long, and edged her lids like a heavy fringe of black silk. With those eyelashes Cornelia had the incredible beauty of a porcelain idealized by some romantic artist.

Eleanor felt Kester's hand close on her wrist. "We'll be back in a minute," he was saying to Cornelia. "I'll take you out something from Miss Crouzet."

They saw her waiting in the corridor. She was apologetic. Hadn't they ever heard that an injury to the eyes often brought a particularly rich supply of blood to the eyelids, stimulating the lashes to such luxuriance as ordinary eyelashes never attained? Yes, it might last indefinitely. It probably would.

When they saw Cornelia again she was being put to bed. "How soon can I go home?" she asked.

"In a week or two," Kester promised.

Cornelia screwed up her face. In her calendar a week or two was a long time. "I sure do miss being home. Won't it be fun, everybody there the way we used to be? You and me and Father and Philip and everybody. I like it when the cotton blooms. In the summer time, when we can play outdoors and have watermelons, and the whole plantation looks so pretty. Mother, is it warm outdoors?"

"It's getting warmer every day."

"I think I ought to have some new dresses. Couldn't I get some new ones?"

"I'll take you shopping as soon as you're well enough."

"That'll be fine. I bet I'm too tall for all my clothes. I bet you're going to have to buy me everything new." Cornelia spoke complacently. "I'll have everything new when I go back to school. Father, you ought to hear me read."

"Can you read, really?" Kester asked.

"You'll be surprised when I show you," Cornelia said, speaking to Kester again. "I can read good. I could read your name on that knife."

"On what knife?"

"The knife that hurt my eye. I showed it to Philip. It had 'Kester Lane' printed right on the handle."

"But my knife wasn't there, Cornelia," he protested. "I had it with me."

"No, you didn't. It was right there on the table. I was going to cut out the elephant's tusks for Philip, and I needed something with a point, and then he wanted to do 'em." Cornelia interrupted herself with a yawn. She was too

Minister's Statement Re Veterans' Medals

OTTAWA, Sept. 17 — When veterans of the Canadian Forces in the Second World War send in their applications for campaign stars and medals about the end of this month there will be no need of them listing those decorations to which they feel they are entitled, Hon. Milton F. Gregg, VC, Minister of Veterans Affairs, said today.

"The job has already been done," Mr. Gregg said. "For the past three years we have been working on the files of the 1,001,875 Canadian men and women who enlisted, and on each file there is now a notation as to the veteran's entitlement. All that will have to be done when the application is received is to check it against the veteran's file and send out those decorations which the veteran earned."

Mr. Gregg warned that there might be delays in receipt of the medals after the application was sent in. This was due to the fact that the medals are being sent out by registered mail. Each package will have to be individually registered and this would impose a very heavy burden on post office facilities. It might be necessary, he explained, to suspend mailings entirely during the period of the peak Christmas rush, even though the post office department is doing everything possible to facilitate distribution.

Application cards should be available at all post offices and Canadian Legion branches during the week of September 26, when the application being necessary to ensure that addresses are accurate.

EPICUREAN DISH

The great vine snail, or edible snail, is a delicacy which was considered a table luxury by the ancient Romans.

It is a very common pest, and in a moment she was sound asleep. Eleanor slipped her hand out of Cornelia's and drew the cover over her. She admonished the nurse, and leaving her with Cornelia they tiptoed back to their waiting room.

As they went in she said in what she tried to make an encouraging voice, "She seems comfortable, doesn't she. I hope she'll sleep all night."

Schools Urged To Provide Training In Leadership

FREDERICTON, Sept. 18 — (CP) — A Montreal industrial relations head Thursday called on Canadian schools to take a "constructive interest" in leadership training.

In an address to the Canadian Education Association convention, T.H. Robinson, manager of industrial relations for Canadian International Paper Co. said there is a growing need for training in leadership. It was incumbent on the schools to take a constructive interest.

"As industrial concerns expand in size and employ more people in an increasing number of occupations, the task of providing adequate leadership through skilled supervision becomes more and more difficult," he said. "We know that leaders can be trained, it is not too much to ask that the school give increasing attention to this problem."

Mr. Robinson asked that schools give more attention to development of understanding of the present social organization, "probably the most important of the many tasks that confront our educational agencies."

Unless this understanding was developed "we run the risk that the kind of life by which we put so great a store will fall about our ears."

Another speaker was Dr. A. C. Leads of Toronto, who this year was a member of an educational mission to the Philippines for the United Nations Educational Scientific and Cultural Organization.

Dr. Leads, dean of the Ontario College of Education at the University of Toronto, said the school problems in the republic "put into the shade" such problems as the teacher shortage which C. E. A. delegates have been discussing.

In the Philippines more than half of the 65,000 teachers are unqualified and the eight public normal schools fall so far short of meeting the needs that private normal schools have developed.

Of the latter, Dr. Leads said there was a lack of uniformity in their standards which on the whole were much lower than those of the government schools.
