THE WOMAN HE MARRIED

BY JANE PHELPS

AT THE FASHIONABLE MODISTE'S Chapter 33.

It was a lovely day, and the ride down-town was restful, as well as delightful. The leaves were just turning, and I enthused over their wonderful colorings, red, russet, yellow and green. I saw that Mildred was amused. She laughed a little, and said: "What a country girl you are." "I love nature, always have. I guess I do sort of act like a country girl at times," I replied flushing, and determined to keep still hereafter.

When we drew up in front of Madame Felice's a man in livery with much gold lace and many brass buttons, his large head topped by a silk hat, opened the door of the car for us. Then going before us he opened the door of the establishment. I was rather awed by so much magnificence, and as we passed through the door failed to hear what Mildred said to me. "Don't look so surprised," she repeated. "Anyone would know just to see your face that you never had been in such a place before."

I blushed furiously. Why couldn't I learn not to show my feelings so plainly? Mildred would think me a fool.

I followed her meekly, trying to appear at ease. She seemed not at all impressed by her surroundings, although the room was lovely. We took seats in a gorgeously furnished room, where every table held a vase of cut flowers, and where wonderful pot plants filled the nooks and corners. "It is lovely!" I couldn't help saying.

"Yes we - her customers pay for all of this."

Now a saleswoman came up to us. She called Mrs. Stowell by name and asked her what sort of clothes she wished to see, street or evening.

"Both" Mildred replied. Soon tall, willowy girls with blonde or dark hair elaborately dressed, and their faces painted in the latest mode, trailed up and down the room, stopping before us, turning this way and that so we might see how the gowns looked from all angles. I was perfectly delighted. I never had seen anything like it before. It was, as I afterwards told Clara, better than going to a show.

Mildred had a fitting, so after we had seen about 20 dresses - the saleswoman called them 'creations' and they were - we went into the fitting room.

This was a tiny room with mirrors. I was surprised that anyone so gorgeous as the woman who came in with Mildred's dress ver her arm, would condescend to work. But she was very polite, almost servile to Mildred. Afterwards, long afterwards, I learned that these saleswomen in big establishments had a different manner for different customers.

The fitting over, Mildred asked to see Madame Felice. In a few moments a small, vivacious French woman appeared in answer to her request.

"This is Mrs. Williams, Madame," Mildred said after greeting her. "I hope she will be a customer of yours before long. Have you anything - not your latest models - that would suit her?" Then asked, "Please see what you can do."

I thought I detected a look of understanding pass between them, but was not sure.

"Certainly, Madame Stowell!" Felice replied with an adorable accent. She left us, but returned in a few moments followed by a girl with three dresses on her arms. "Perhaps one of these will suit Madame," Felice remarked, holding up one of them, a lovely chiffon gown.

"No - she wants a more practical dress than that," Mildred said. "Then this!" A lovely soft black satin with embroidery in a wonderful shade of blue.

"Yes, that's the sort of dress. Try it on, Nan."

Mildred frowned at me, and I said no more, but commenced to remove my suit.

The dress fitted me almost as if it had been made for me. It was lovely, and so becoming! It was just the sort of dress I needed, or thought I did, and wanted. I would be dressed enough when wearing it to go almost anywhere, yet not too much dressed for luncheon or theatre.

"You must take it, Nan. Madame will make the few alterations and send it. You can pay when convenient," she added in a whisper. "I have vouched for you with Madame."

Tomorrow - Nan Pays for a Model.
