YE EDITOR HAS ANOTHER CALLER

By the Patriot's Office Cat

The other day as I was basking in the sunshine on the ledge of the office window and the editor was deep in thought at his desk a rap came to the door. The rap was a peculiar one, different from any I had heard before, and it is more years than I care to remember since I became an attaché of the office paper. The editor was so immersed in thought that he did not hear the rap or if he did hear it he paid no attention. But after all it makes little difference from which angle his action or lack of action is viewed.

"Come in," said the editor in no gentle tone, and sure enough the knocker came in.

The newcomer was certainly not much to look at. His face was haggard as if he had lately had many anxious moments, and his clothes such as they were hung loosely about his spare figure as if he had been made for him when he was in good health. Although he was a disputable looking specimen of humanity, as I looked I got down from my position at the window and sidled over to my old place underneath the editor's desk. I didn't know what was going on, but I thought it best to be on hand, but I thought it best to be on hand.

"Well, sir, whom have I the honor of addressing," said the editor as he allowed his eyes to wander over the visitor. "I do not recall ever having met you before."

"That's a nice way to treat an old friend," said the stranger, as a sad look came over his face. "But it's the way of the world. When a man is down no one has any use for him."

"I am the all that's left of the Liberal party," the stranger went on. "In a few days of my prosperity you may refuse to recognize me, and you even supped at my table. But now that conditions have changed you do not seem to know me. Now that I am unable to provide suitable food and raiment for myself and my friends I get more kicks than copes all around."

"Well, I never would have known you," said the editor as he far away look came into his eyes. "As I remember the Liberal party it was strong and robust and full of life and vigor, but now it looks to be a mere shadow of its former self. Even N. E. Matheson ceased to write odes to it. It has all the symptoms of being a full-fledged member of the Down and Out Club."

"Yes," sadly remarked the caller, "your analysis is correct. While the party was in the bloom of health and strength we sowed our wild oats and now we are paying for it. By and bye, when a generation grows up and our record is forgotten we may get another chance. In the meantime we must keep a stiff upper lip and throw all the mud we can at the other fellow. Some of it may stick, you know."

"And I don't see the best I can do that way," said the boss. "For instance, haven't I got after the Matheson Government for not shipping all the war oats when deep down in my heart of hearts I knew that whatever delay there has been is not their fault. The order of shipping the oats was entrusted to the agents and merchants and the president of the Liberal Association was one of them. This circumstance interferes sadly with the discharge of the duty I owe the Liberal party."

"I don't think you should have touched that matter for me in the rejoinder," especially in the way you did. Politics stick out all through your references to it, and you ought to know that people do not want their politics mixed up with the war. It takes an unusually clever man to mix the two so accurately that the cloven hoof will not be seen."

"I could see that the editor did not like the way his caller talked, but he did not say anything. Between you and me the boss is having hard sledding these days. But he doesn't mind when it's all over. He's a sport, the boss is."

"By the way," went on the strange-looking gink, "how are things going in a political way? I don't want any newspaper dope. Be honest. Do you think the party will do any better this time than it did last? What are your chances in Belfast, for instance?"

"Well, since you put it to me that way, I must tell you that things are none too good but for mercy sake don't let on that I told you so. Indeed, it looks as if I was up against it in Belfast again. That fellow McPhail seems to have the constituency cinched. He is at the front, you know, and has been honored for bravery while the nearest I have got to the firing line is the Home Guards. That was great sport for me until the drill got too strenuous. I didn't find the early drills, but when they began running around to straighten their wind I took a quiet sneak. I didn't think my wind needed special treatment. Besides, my specialty is running elections, and not cavorting around drill halls like a two year old."

"Believe me, you have my sympathy," was the reply of the visitor. "The Liberal party seems to have fallen upon evil days. In its prosperous days things were different. Then there was no scarcity of good men offering for election. But now that there is little chance of winning any old thing can get a constituency."

"I didn't know just how to take that," said the editor, and I thought I detected a look of anger on his usually placid countenance. "I want you to understand that there are just as good men in the Liberal party today as there were in the days you recall. Some of these are in the field to-day," added the boss as his chest expanded several inches, "and there is one right before you."

Excuse me interrupted the visitor. "I did not mean to hurt your feelings. You know that present company is always excepted. There are few men in the Liberal party today working harder to promote its return to power than you are. I hope that when they come back they will remember your sacrifices, especially the two offered up in Belfast and that other one in Charlottetown. Few men would so willingly immolate themselves on the altar of political patriotism."

"Your explanation is accepted," said the boss with a pleased look. "I felt sure you did not mean to be personal. But I am so hot up by a lot of ginks who come in here from time to time telling me what I must do to pull the party out of the hole it is in that you must not be surprised if I lose my temper now and then. I am trying to make the most I can out of a bad case and the work has made me very irritable."

"Don't feel so badly about it," said the caller as he rose to go. "You have my sympathy and blessing which is all I have to give."

Then the uncanny visitor rose to depart and the editor accompanied him to the door. There was some private talk between them there which I did not catch. Judging by the look on the editor's face however it was none too pleasant. My impression is that as the scarecrow went out he took the boss's last quarter.

ORANGEMEN DOING THEIR DUTY

The item published in the Island press last week quoting from a speech delivered by Dr. Sproule, P. G. M., has created a wrong impression and possibly the doctor was wrongly quoted. We note from official figures that out of 31,900 men who formed the first contingent, 8,000 were members of the Orange Order. This ratio was true of the second and third contingents, and would be true of all contingents that may follow. In so far as our own province is concerned the order is doing its full duty loyally, both in men and money. Among the island boys who are now at the front we might mention Capt. Stanley, Capt. Campbell, Lieut. Martin, Sergt. Geo. Brady, Gunner Proud and a host of others, all prominent in the Order. Our city lodges have given their best of men and money in this crisis followed nobly by the country lodges, and our Government will receive the Order's full support in this province for the maintenance of those glorious privileges which we enjoy under the folds of the crosses of St. George, St. Andrew and St. Patrick.

I am, Sir, etc.,
GEORGE H. TANTON.

GRAND RIVER SCHOOL CLOSING

The Bayside half yearly examination took place on Tuesday, June 23rd in the presence of a large crowd of ratepayers and outsiders. The examination opened by a recitation by Miss Beaglow. The scholars were examined by Miss Pauline Gillis, Miss Mary McIntyre, Mr. Ray Brown and the president of the Liberal Association, Mr. Eagan. After the examining of the different classes and the recitations were over a few remarks were touched by those examining the scholars and the ratepayers among whom were a number of school teachers. All were perfectly satisfied with the work, accordingly during the past six months and also praised the teacher for her work during the term of three years she has been there. The scholars presented the teacher with a beautiful camera after reading the following address.

Dear Teacher:—Although this should be a day of rejoicing for our holiday season having arrived, still having learned of your approaching departure it is rather one of deepest sorrow. As that sad day is now here when you are about to leave us, we try by this short and inefficient address to express our feelings of gratitude toward you for the many pains you have taken to instill into our dull minds the many treasures of your knowledge.

The three happy years you have been with us are now ended. Their many pleasures remains the sweet memories of a dream, but the fruits of your labors are real and evident, and although, through our inability they may not be as abundant as you would desire, still we believe they compare very favorably with the results of any work previously done in our midst. Now that your time with us has expired, neither tongue nor pen can give true expression to the sad feeling in our hearts. We feel that the font of knowledge from which we drank so freely and with such pleasure shall now be closed to us, and the keys placed in the hands of a stranger who may nourish or sterve our fast growing minds at will. We feel that we are indebted to you for all your care and kindness and owe a gratitude which we can never repay. We ask you to receive this small token as a remembrance of your loving pupils. We trust that success may always crown your efforts and happiness may ever brighten your path and now we all join in pronouncing that parting word—farewell.

The trustees and parents of this district join in with their scholars and claim they are losing one of the best teachers that has ever taught in their school and after all endeavors to retain her proved fruitless they wished her happiness and success and hope to abide among them for her remaining days.

By order ALEX. McINTYRE.

SUMMER SCHOOL FOR TEACHERS.—The Instructor in Nature Study is Wm. D. Fuller, Union Superintendent Orange and Queen Town, Maine. He is a graduate of the State Normal School at Stevens Point, Wisconsin. He pursued his post graduate studies at the Universities of California and Chicago, devoting himself especially to child study and to methods of teaching and administration of schools. He is a Licensed Institute Conductor of Wisconsin, and a Lecturer in Educational Topics and has a fine musical education.

Mr. Fuller has been successively teacher in rural schools, teacher in city grades, Principal of High school, teacher in the University Demonstration School of Wisconsin, and Superintendent of Schools.

The course in Nature Study now being given by Mr. Fuller in the Summer School for Teachers deals with the methods of teaching and with the relation of the subject to the other school subjects. An attempt is made to get the teachers interested in the common things about the schools that may be used with success especially in the country schools.

Nature songs are taken up with a group of teachers.

Mr. Fuller is new to the school and to the province but he has made himself very popular both in and out of the class-room during his short stay.
