CHAPTER IX

A low cry of dismay escaped Paul and Herman Balch stopped in his stride and stared at her stonily. "Is this the truth?" "Of course, it is! Why else would I come all the way over here to tell you?" "You might figure it a good way of earning your money—to make up a story like this."

"Ah, yes, I have already heard of your good work Miss Kirkman. What brings you here at this hour?" "Why don't you all speak German?" she smiled at the officer. "It seems to be easier for you."

"The war's over isn't it. What would you be spying on? Besides I don't care what you are as long as I get paid for my work."

"Well I've got to be getting back to the Cafe, now." She rose rather abruptly, clutching her purse and coat and for the first time noticed what the officer's massive figure had concealed before.

"The officer met her startled gaze and smiled irritably. 'A friend of yours, Miss Kirkman?'"

"He looked vastly amused. 'Come, come, Miss Kirkman. Surely you would not have us believe that a night club entertainer, a woman of the world so to speak, could be so unknowing?'"

"He seemed to have forgotten both Paul and Herman as he took a step toward her. 'I find your company most desirable to part with, Miss Kirkman. You will please remain with us and quietly, unless you care to join the gentlemen in the other room. We are not fooled so easily—you must realize that we could not let you go after what you have seen and heard here tonight. Eh, my friends?'"
