WINTER VENTILATION

This month many people will check their furnaces in preparation for the winter months. They should also ensure that ventilating equipment and humidity control mechanisms are operating at peak efficiency. Adequate fresh air and a proper degree of humidity are necessary during the winter to maintain health and to guard against respiratory diseases.

BURGESS BEDTIME STORIES

WHAT KEEN EYES SAW

Like mighty trees from tiny seeds, Disaster springs from careless deeds.

—Old Mother Nature.

King Eagle was uneasy. He said that he wasn't worrying, but Mrs. Eagle knew that he was and said so. He said he wasn't worrying, but was a little anxious. Mrs. Eagle couldn't see the difference between being anxious and worrying. Can you? Anyway, there was no doubt that King Eagle was uneasy, and it was wholly on account of the weather.

For days that had run into weeks there had been no rain. Night after night there had been no dew. All the trees of the Green Forest were thirsty. Those outside the Green Forest were even more thirsty. Their leaves were drying up and turning brown and dropping. The Green Meadows were no longer green, but were brown, for the grass was so dry that it was crisp. Plants of all kinds were withering and dying. Laughing Brook no longer laughed, for there was not water enough in it to more than gurgle faintly. The Smiling Pond had grown smaller until it was, as Grandfather Frog said disgustedly, little more than a puddle. The cattails and rushes around it were suffering from dry feet. Even the Big River had lost much of its bigness. So the dry weather brought thirst and discomfort and uneasiness to all who live in the Green Forest and on the Green Meadows. Dread took possession of many of them. What they dreaded they didn't know. It was just a feeling that had something to do with the dry weather. But King Eagle knew. Yes, sir, King Eagle knew. He has lived for many years, and watching so many seasons come and go, he has learned much. He knows what is likely to happen in great storms with high winds. He knows that floods follow too much rain. And he learned to associate the coming of the Red Terror which we call fire, with very dry weather.

A thread of smoke was rising from the leaves on one side of the Crooked Little Path.

Perched on a rock on the Great Mountain, King Eagle can see for a great distance, for his eyes are the far-seeing kind and very wonderful. Now on what seemed like the edge of the Great World beyond the Purple Hills he saw a small cloud rising. Looking hard at it, he knew that it wasn't a rain cloud, and his uneasiness grew. He knew that that cloud was made by the Red Terror, a fire too far away to ever get to the Great Mountain or the Green Forest at the foot of it. He knew from what he had seen of fires in other years that it was happening there, and it made him more uneasy than ever. He spread his broad wings and flew out into space. He sailed in a great circle high above the Green Forest and the lower slopes of the Great Mountain. Watching below, he could, even at that height, see much that went on there, for those wonderful eyes of his could see things on the ground as clearly as if he were no higher than the tops of the trees.

The Crooked Little Path winds through the Green Mountain. From so high above it, King Eagle could see things on the ground as clearly as if he were no higher than the tops of the trees. The Crooked Little Path winds through the Green Mountain. From so high above it, King Eagle could see things on the ground as clearly as if he were no higher than the tops of the trees. At a turn of the Lone Little path part way up the Great Mountain he saw two men. They were sitting on an old log beside the Crooked Little Path resting. They were on their way down from an old lumber camp on the side of the Great Mountain. King Eagle saw a tiny yellow flash as one of them lighted a cigarette. The one who had been smoking dropped his cigarette on the ground and stepped on it, though he did, King Eagle, circling high above, watched them for a while to see what they might do. They kept right on down the Crooked Little Path, and didn't once look back. They moved fast for going down hill was easy and they were in a hurry to get home. King Eagle swung around until he was above the place where he had first seen the men. A thread of smoke was rising from the leaves on one side of the Crooked Little Path. It was no more than a thread, but even so King Eagle watched, and uneasily wondered what it meant, it thickened, rising higher and beginning to spread out above the trees. King Eagle circled lower. Something red with little flashes of yellow was running along the ground and spreading as it ran. King Eagle knew what it was. It was the Red Terror. And there was nothing nothing at all, that he could do about it.
