THE GUARDIAN SHORT STORY

IN RETREAT

By TROY ALLISON

The dog beside her growled, and the woman, looking up from her novel, saw the man coming down the path.

The path was overgrown with weeds, and there were few indications that it was used except by the cattle coming to the creek for water.

"Perhaps he is a stickler for etiquette," he suggested, "and might regard my civilities with less—er—animosity if I offered him my card."

"I must admit he shows more amability toward people to whom he has been introduced."

"Kindly introduce me to him properly," he implored. "I wouldn't further offend his sense of propriety for worlds."

"Billie, most able bodyguard of an unprotected spinster, allow me to make you acquainted with one Dr. James Ferroll."

"Quite charmed, old fellow, I assure you," Ferroll bowed extravagantly.

"You did that just right," Ferroll whooped when she triumphantly landed her first fish.

"Billie and I spend hours in this spot every day. If you do much fishing you will probably meet us with us occasionally."

"We are suffering from an outrageous hunger, Sally," she said to the buxom negro woman that met her at the cabin door.

"When Miss Winchester had first announced that she was tired of her usual summers at Newport and had told her married brother that he might use her cottage for the season her people had wondered why she should desire anything different from the lovely cottage where she had spent her summers for the last ten years."

"With the help of the farmer who owned the cabin she had fitted it up for rough camping life. The negro, Sally, had been recommended as a good cook and an able protector from ordinary calamities."

"Next day Ferroll had been in luck and had filled his basket when she reached the creek."

"Good morning, Billie," he called out. "I hope we are on friendly terms today?"

"That's right, old fellow, make yourself at home. I hope he doesn't object to smoke?"

renient bush and lit a cigar preparatory to a few minutes' chat.

"He never has shown any special fondness for tobacco," her smile struck Ferroll as possessing qualities of unconventionality and good comradeship.

"You are rather a plucky woman," he looked at her admiringly.

"Mrs. Fenlon. She has been there for the last three years only. And his observation being concentrated on his newest smoke ring, he failed to see the crimson that flushed her face when he mentioned the name of her own next door neighbor at Newport."

"It's the first time in three weeks that he has not been here first, Billie," she said.

"Billie gave a snort that either expressed ridicule for the anxiety in her voice or disapproval of having his ears rubbed the wrong way; then he suddenly sat up to listen, and in a few minutes Ferroll came down the path."

"Suppose you tell us how you became aware of your mental defects," she suggested.

"Billie, I dare not tell how I discovered the fact of my idleness. Last night when I left the creek I was a happy man. I had determined to come down here this morning and ask you how you would like to live in a house with a doctor's sign on it."

"The woman sat perfectly quiet while he continued his confidences."

"Now, she would always think I was after her money, you unsympathetic brute, and, to make matters worse, I have kept her amused for three weeks with jokes about the old maid at Newport. Billie, do you think there is a living woman that would overlook being called an old maid?"

"Lend me an ear, Billie. You ought to be a well trained dog. For you have spent hours on your education. Get up and express nicely to the gentleman your overwhelming desire to live in a house ornamented by a doctor's sign."

"Then she managed to force her head away from Ferroll's shoulder long enough to add another sentence."

"You might state that your mistress has a fondness for egregious idiots, Billie."
