Romance Comes High

BY NELLY GRAF

CHAPTER XXXIII

Though Ming thought that her attempt to overcome the estrangement between herself and Paul had been futile, she was mistaken. He had been pleased to find her waiting up for him that night and pleased by her solicitude over his financial difficulties.

However, when she said she might be able to help him with the money that Kirk hoped to get for her garden plans, his pleasure suddenly gave place to resentment he hadn't forgotten what Jane had said about Ming and Kirk, and the more he'd thought about it the more convinced he had become that Jane was probably right—that those two had fallen in love.

Hence, Ming's mention of Kirk was unfortunate. It touched Paul on his sore spot. He felt sure that Kirk's interest in Ming's "gardens" was based purely and simply on his interest in Ming. And he was suspicious of Kirk's expectation of selling them for a "big price". Probably the fellow meant to put up his own money and fool her into thinking it actually came from the sale of her work. In any case, he, Paul, wanted no part of it! It was kind of Ming to offer it to him, but he could get along without Kirk Shelton's assistance.

Despite this reaction of Paul's, there was one good result from Ming's attempt to bridge the gap between them. Feeling guilty over the brusque way he had responded he began coming home for dinner instead of staying in town every evening. He and Ming continued to be very reserved but, at least, they were now seeing more of each other.

Then one evening, as they rose from dinner, Ming said, "I finished my garedn plans today and thought I'd take them over to Kirk this evening. Want to come along?"

Paul hesitated, then said "No—I believe not, if you don't mind. I want to look through a trade magazine I brought home with me."

After Ming was gone, however, he made no pretense of reading the magazine. He sat in the living room, smoking his pipe and frowning. It was odd, he thought, that she had asked him to go along. If Jane were right, she wouldn't want him with her when she went to see Kirk Well, probably she was merely being polite.

His thoughts were suddenly interrupted by the sound of the front door being flung open. The next instant, to his astonishment, Ruth came rushing into the room. Her eyes had a wild look and she was out of breath.

"Ruth!" he exclaimed, leaping up. "Where on earth did you come from?"

"I came out on the train," she panted. "Where's Ming?"

She has gone over to Kirk's house. What's wrong?"

"Who said anything was wrong? "Well you certainly look as though something were wrong. Sit down and tell me about it."

"No, I just wanted to leave something for Ming—a package. It's out in the hall .I've got to go now."

"Where are you going?"

"That's my business!"

"Look here," Paul said soothly, "why don't you wait for Ming? She ought to be back soon, and she'll be disappointed if she doesn't see you."

"No!" Ruth started toward the door.

"Wait a minute!" Paul caught hold of her arm. "Ruth, I can see you're upset about something. Why not tell me?"

"You wouldn't be interested! Her voice rose hysterically. "No more than you've ever been interested! You've never so much as lifted a finger for any of Ming's family! In this case though, it wouldn't do any good!"

She wrenched away from him and rushed out into the night.

Paul stood uncertainly for a few minutes, then hurried after her. Something was obviously very wrong—and he had a dreadful hunch what she [illegible] doing He must stop her!

He trailed her down the highway. She had a good head start, but he soon lessened the distance between them. He saw her turn off on to a side road that led to a near-by lake.

As she approached the lake, she quickened her steps, began to run. Paul, too, broke into a run. He managed to catch up with her just as she reached the edge of the lake.

He grasped her arm. "Ruth—"

"Let go of me!" she cried, trying to pull away from him. "Don't stop me,! Please."

"I will stop you, Ruth, what's the matter? Whats happened?"

She suddenly ceased struggling and went limp. Bursting into sobs, she sagged against him.

"D-Darrell is going to marry Jill Blaney. We—he and I—I-love each other, but he's afraid to marry me—afraid he'll be disinherited He—he's marrying that other girl just to please his family and—oh I want to die!"

"No, you don't—you just think you do." Paul said quietly. "Come on back home with me and let's talk this over."

"No. No. It isn't any use. I love Darrell too much. If I can't have him, I don't want to go on living. If—if you had treated me as a sister and given me a chance to go around with the right people, maybe the Moore family wouldn't look down on me, but now,— now it's too late."

"It isn't too late, Ruth. I—I know I've been a pretty poor brother-in-law—and I was a pretty poor son-in-law to your mother. I've failed Ming—failed all of you. I see that now and I'm terribly sorry. Let me make up for it."

"There's—there's nothing you can do—nothing anyone can do."

"Yes, there is, I'll have a talk with Darrell. We'll both go and see him—tonight' Where is he?

"I—I think he said he was going to see his sister Jane."

"All right—come along We'll drive into town to Jane's apartment."

Ruth continued to protest, but Paul took a firm hold on her arm and started her back toward the house.

Soon, they were in his car, speeding toward town.

DESABLE AND VICINITY

Mr. and Mrs. Henry Petersen, were recent visitors to Cape Traverse.

Mr. Windsor Howatt spent the week-end at his home in Victoria.

A few anglers have tried their luck in the pond here. The season seems to be a favorable one.

Mr. and Mrs. George MacLean, and daughter Marion were week-end guests in the Appin Road.

The teacher spent the week-end at her home in Augustine Cove.

Mr. and Mrs. Cecil Gass and family were the guests of her parents, Mr. and Mrs. Ernest Holm, DeSable for a few days.

Mr. and Mrs. Elmer Walsh were recent visitors to DeSable.

The many friends of Mr. Basil Holm are glad to see him out and able to work again after his serious illness.

On Thursday (April 26,) evening the many friends and neighbors of Mr. and Mrs. John MacFarlane and Mr. and Mrs. Walter MacFarlane met at their home to bid farewell to them ere they take up residence elsewhere. Mr. Hector MacKay was chairman for the evening. An address to Mr and Mrs. John MacFarlane was read by Mr. Ernest Holm and a well filled purse presented to them by Mrs. George Bell. Another address to Mr. and Mrs. Walter MacFarlane was read by Mr. Melville Bell and a well filled purse was presented to them, by Mrs. Myron Shaw. The chairman then called on the two couples for a few words In a few well chosen words they individually thanked one and all for their kindness and well wishes bestowed upon them on their departure. The National Anthem was then sung. The remainder of the evening was spent in social intercourse and dancing. A delicious lunch was served by the hostess and the ladies. At a late hour all wended their way home feeling they had spent a most enjoyable evening, but sad at the thought of losing such well respected and valuable neighbors from the community.
