SANDRA THE JEALOUS

By Jane Phelps "THERE IS NO POSSIBLE EXPLANATION" "I was just coming to look for you, Sandra!" Everett said as he stepped into the hall. Miss Pierce had evidently followed his advice and gone upstairs. "Why? Haven't I a right to be late once in a blue moon? You often keep me waiting, you know." I answered as lightly as I could. The door was open; Thomas was listening. Perhaps Thomas knew of that tray in the library and was even now laughing in his sleeve at me as how easily I was fooled? Instead of going upstairs I went into the library. "Better run up and get ready for dinner, Sandra." Everett said, glancing at the clock. "I don't want any dinner!" I had closed the door carefully. I was absolutely reckless of my life now. "Don't want any dinner! Are you ill?" My appetite was usually very good. Hence his question. "Yes, I'm sick! Sick to death of your actions. It was bad enough before, but when it comes to making love to a servant in your own house it is enough to sicken any woman." "What in the world are you talking about, Sandra?" he demanded, growing stern as he always did when accused. "I am talking of you! Your actions! Because I have kept still all ways, or almost always, you think I shall always do so. But you are mistaken! I won't this time, I can assure you. I was trembling with anger, outraged pride, and jealousy. I tore my gloves off, threw them beside my hat on the table, and faced him: "I not only heard, but I SAW you making love to Miss Pierce. Either she or I leave this house at once. At once!" I repeated, almost screaming. "Stop!" Everett stood over me in a threatening manner, his face white with anger. "Do you realize that you are insulting me, as well as Miss Pierce?" Evidently you were wrong. For her sake I will explain. Your actions I cannot explain. "There is no possible explanation of what I saw and heard!" "There is. And you must listen to it," he quietly turned the key in the door. "That child might come back and know what you have thought," he said. A plying note crept into his voice. "I tell you I do not want to hear any explanation. I shall not believe it, so it will be useless." "Nevertheless you shall hear. Miss Pierce has just heard of the marriage of a younger sister who remained at home and helped her step-mother (who is not domestic) to keep house. They cannot afford a servant, so now have sent for Miss Pierce, telling her it is her duty to come home at once and take the sister's place. She was looking for you with the letter, then I came in and she showed it to me instead. She is terribly averse to going, yet wants to do what is right. "I suppose that was what she meant when she said I would never consent to let her stay!" I sneered determined not to be convinced. "And I suppose that was why you put your arms around her." "Your name wasn't mentioned, Sandra. She asked for you and when Thomas told her you had not yet come in, she never spoke of you again. She was talking of her step-mother, whom I judge to be rather common, as well as selfish. I have advised her to remain with us; and promised to write her father that she will do so. I see no reason why she should be sacrificed to a selfish step-mother's whims, as well as we be robbed of a good nurse." I said nothing. I did not know whether I was convinced or not. "You have heard all I have to say. I would suggest that you get ready for dinner." He unlocked the door just as Hetty appeared, announcing it was ready. "I'll be down directly," I said. "Oh, Mrs. Graham! I am so glad you have come!" It was Miss Pierce's voice arrested my attention. "I have talked it over with Mr. Graham, but I want your opinion. Will you let me come to your room a few minutes after dinner?" "If you wish," I ungraciously replied. But she didn't seem to notice and thanked me affusively. Tomorrow - A Realization and a Plea.
