In Memoriam. In loving memory of James Freeman Logan, who's thirty-first birthday is July 25th and who was suddenly killed May 3rd.

We never thought when we woke The blow was sudden, the shock severe. To part with one we loved so dear. God took him home, it was His will.

But in our hearts we love him still. I cannot say and I will not say That he is dead, he is just away. With his cheery smile and a wave of his hand He left it that morn for a better land.

ELLEN'S DIARY

Partition set in place; a fence being repaired or maybe, I thought, with the season at hand, a change was being effected in a mow or a barn-loft. At any rate, I could hear the sound of hammering. Nails were being driven home.

But at Pard's delighted bark, he too as I did, left his work and made his way to the yard. To meet Bob's truck, returning from taking the other members of the family and guests to an afternoon at the Sunday School picnic. I had a hoo in my hand. Bob, catching sight of it, smiled as he might to Jamie. "I see you've been busy" he remarked. And smiles which held that superiority and tolerance that youth affords went the rounds of the party. Like, well, she's getting old, so she feels she must be doing something to help with the work. And she almost exhausts herself at some useless endeavour when all the time she would have given as much assistance if she had been making herself a batch of mud pies. But if she likes to be at such things, we let her. If she finds any amusement therein? All of this was written in clear characters in the smiles that went the rounds in the yard this morning.

I had been ending my day in the outdoors, by a brisk bout with a company of Canada thistles in the orchard. Now that I have commenced it, James will likely finish it in no time with the scythe, which he wields with a fairly good hand, though he will be bound to attend to such things in a certain time of the day, or season, or moon. For there are proper times and seasons for all such endeavours, on a farm. I answered calmly: "I've had a perfectly lovely afternoon. And Jamie's delight of his still fresh in mind replied for the rest, matter-of-factly: "And we did too!" The picnic was held in a pretty spot beside the Strait. And if as I want about my "perfectly lovely" afternoon, there were old times when my thoughts strayed to follow those gone on the outing and I felt nostalgic and a mite wistful, I had only myself to reproach for not accompanying them thither. At such a time one does long for the wind that blows in fresh and clear; for the sound of the waves breaking on the shore or vaguely moving at ebb in the distance; for the water fowl piping and screaming, sunlight burnishing wings, for the blue-green of the sparkling water or the wavy sand left damply disclosed. However, much as I always enjoy family and guests, I recall heaving a sincere sigh of relief when, after the hub-bub of preparations the truck had rolled down the driveway on its outward way leaving Alderlea to Pard and me—our throne the old stone door-step, and we "monarchs of all" we surveyed. "The dog," I said to him, and he is an understanding creature of a dog, for he wagged a knowing tail "we're free to do exactly as we please this whole afternoon."

But with our nice anticipations a sea of regret engulfed us. Faintly from the field at the end of the wood-road which led through the stump field, I could hear the sound of the mowers. Our having commenced this morning. Sadly we turned towards indoors. Our Summer which up to today had been fresh and unspoiled, with Nature clothing every field and woodland was now being stripped of some of its loveliness, its beauty beginning to fade. The whistle-cutting of mine was merely one episode in the afternoon. Part of it, I had idled luxuriously away in reading and then as though sorry for it and anxious to make up for "wasted" time, down on my knees, I continued the garden weeding, continuing from where Jeanie had recently left it. I gathered the evening eggs unconsciously following old habits; I killed a protesting pair of broody hens; I prepared supper for our hay-makers, and was present at the milking and separating. And I have almost forgotten the most important incident of all. It happened on the spur of the moment and from an inspiration that came to me, while waiting for the workers to come to their meal. It materialized not as a result of "one fell swoop" but from several well meant but mostly futile blows. I am smug in my secret, which has to be with something that promises to be delicious and now is still and white in a pan of salted water. But "Ellen!" James calls me desperately "I can't manage this boot at all" then adds and a note of triumph is evident "but I've got the other one off!"

Until tomorrow — Diary — Good-night.
