THE STAY AT HOME Let others go and suffocate in chambers six by nine. These torrid nights a hammock strung upon the roof is fine. While broiling on a sandy beach some foolish folks may please, I much prefer with book and pipe at home to take my ease.

"Well, so long, Cook, where are you going to spend your vacation?" "Going to spend my vacation money at the seashore, and the rest of my vacation at home."

Run-a-Way-Balloon: Fine up here isn't it? Kite: Yep, but not nearly as quiet as it used to be. Lindy herself nearly hit me last week.

Married Quarters

"Why don't you tell me things, Reggie? I'm not— You needn't be afraid of hurting me. Nothing could be worse than the silence of the grave I've been living in ever since it happened."

"They haven't written, then?" he ventured to ask. "No, of course they haven't, and you know it perfectly well. Did they behave as if nothing had happened?" "They couldn't do anything else, as there were half a dozen at least at lunch."

"How did they look?" asked Poppy with a queer, bursting note in her voice.

"I couldn't see any difference. Of course they must feel it dreadfully. Poppy Bradford seems quite a decent sort of a chap, but the war won't last for ever, you know, Poppy, and then—"

"Then there'll be the devil to pay," added Poppy unexpectedly. "Of course, I know all that better than you can tell me. If you'd hurried up and simply made me marry you, same as Jim did, ever so long ago, of course this would not have happened."

It was a most outrageous statement, very characteristic of the irresponsible creature who uttered it. But irresponsibility which can be charming enough in youth dancing on the edge of life, is a little less attractive in a woman who has taken the most serious step life has to offer.

Poppy stole a side glance at Reggie's plain but familiar profile, and beheld it stolidly set. She was a born coquette, and she had been accustomed to make him flutter in her hand like a captured bird. Poppy did not like the change. It somehow seemed to make her old, and all things in the world stale, flat and unprofitable.

"So it's a case of, 'Oh, no, they never mention her,'" she said with a slightly mocking note in her voice. "Well, two can play at that game. When you next go back to Cadham to lunch on Sunday, you can give them my compliments, and tell them I'm having a perfectly ripping time."

"I shan't do anything of the sort, Poppy, even if I believed it." Poppy suddenly stood still, panting, her small feet encased in entrancing brogues, on the gravelled path.

"You've got to believe it, Reggie, and so have I. Don't you think marriage is rather an awful thing on the whole, the sort of thing that goes on, world without end, no matter what you feel about it?"

"People usually consider that before they jump into it," observed Reggie, and was about to add that he would only have been too glad to have gone on, world without end, alongside Poppy, but pulled himself up sharply, remembering the rules of the game.

"Oh, slow it, Reggie. It doesn't sit well on you to be a duty-monger. Let me tell you something, Reggie. Duty spelled with a big D is the fetish worshipped by the middle class."

"I've always heard they are the most moral and solid section of the community, though in the army I've sampled a few of the sort, too," said Reggie, fumbling for his cigarette case. "I forgot to say Trix was at home last Sunday."

"Was she?" asked Poppy, breathlessly. "She must be in the conspiracy of silence, too, for I've written her down for a week-end. Napoo!" Poppy stood aghast.

It is as fine as the good old English Stout. Mail 75c for a package, which makes 4 gallons, to M. Allen & Co., Ltd., Fleet St., Toronto 2"

"You don't mean to say she's voluntarily, of her own free will, given up Victoria Station and her boys?" "She has, I do assure you."

"But why?" "Well, if you will have it, she came down to stand by them after you left, and she told me she thought she ought to stop for a bit at least, so she's stopping, that's all."

"Is Trix also among the prophets? I never could have believed it possible. Oh, Reggie, the world is upside down, and I'm very much afraid I'm among the bottom dogs."

"No, no, you're quite all right really," said Vandaleur nervously, for the tremor in Poppy's voice and the suspicious drops on her curling lashes tempted him to forget the rules of the game. "And this is a top-hole billet you've got here. You must stick to it. That's the best you can do; in fact, old pal, it's the only thing."

Poppy stared at him so long that he threw away his cigarette and of his own accord turned back.

"We'd better be toddling. The General will be wanting to go, I'm sure."

Poppy turned too, and her little face had hardened, and was set like a cameo, as beautiful and as cold. She had received a blow, the poignancy of which Reggie Vandaleur had no idea. He, too, had put her out of his world.

There was a curious coldness about her good-byes a few moments later. The radiance of her smile had departed; no more words of delicious badinage fell from her lips. Jim, interested in his new experience as host, did not notice the fine difference in his wife's looks. It was not that he cared less, or was impervious to her moods, but merely that he was in the grip of the man's life, which no woman ever really shares.

He was a good soldier, and because of it everything and every one conspired with the great game of war was of moment in his eyes. That his General should have lunched under his roof, even if the initial reason was to renew acquaintance with Poppy, made no difference to the fact. Jim went back to H.Q. satisfied with himself. And Poppy? Left alone in the quiet house after Jane had gone, Poppy shut the doors between her and Slatery's Ann, struggling with the debris of the feast, and threw herself on the hard old horsehair sofa and bit into her pink silk cushion with angry, vicious teeth. Finally, crook in hand, she took Wotan for a long tramp over the upper part of Lanrick Moor, the part which the fringes of the camp did not touch. When she came back she was dead tired, and fell asleep on the old horsehair sofa, and there Jim found her when he came in at half-past six o'clock. She awoke to find him standing over her, smiling queerly down into her face.

"Oh, it's you!" she said discontentedly. "Well, and what do you want?" "You, darling," he answered, and bent as if to kiss her, but she threw herself away.

KELLOGGS' DENY RUMOR

BATTLE CREEK, Mich., July 28.—The following statement was authorized today by Mr. W. K. Kellogg, Chairman of the board of the Kellogg Company, leading manufacturers of cereal foods:

"Reports to the effect that the Kellogg Company is contemplating alliance with other companies in the food industry are being brought to my attention with increasing frequency. I wish to state with the utmost emphasis possible that all such reports are absolutely without foundation. The Kellogg Company is not now and never has been for sale."

"We have at various times, of course, received flattering offers from both related and unrelated lines of business. We in the Kellogg Company, however, have spent many years in perfecting our line of products and in establishing the reputation these products enjoy. We are not interested either in associating these products with unrelated lines or in submerging any part of the prestige that has been built up by the Kellogg Company."

"Furthermore, we hold strongly to the belief that healthy competition between large and solidly established firms is the best possible means for assuring the public increasing returns in quality and service."

"The soundness of these principles and the wisdom of the greatly expanded manufacturing and merchandising programs we launched at the beginning of the year in the face of the general spirit of depression have been confirmed by the volume of business we have done during the first half of 1930."

FIND WOMAN SHRUNK BY STARVATION FROM WEIGHT OF 160 POUNDS TO 38

CHICAGO, Ill., July 28.—The police today walked in upon a strange scene in the cottage where Miss Dina Schreiner lived.

Miss Schreiner, 55 years old, speechless and deaf from lack of nourishment, lay on a bed, shrunk by starvation from a normal weight of 160 pounds to 38. Seated watching her were her brother-in-law, Jacob Pfeiffer, 78 years old, and her nephew, Joseph Shea, 37.

An ambulance was called and the woman moved to a hospital. Shortly afterward she was dead. She had fasted so long that physicians dared give her only a mixture of milk and water, and even this was fed to her in a medicine dropper.

Pfeiffer and Shea were ordered held. It was Shea who called attention to the condition of his aunt, notifying Dr. S. O. Myerson, who in turn called police.

Miss Schreiner when found was too weak to talk or even to signify by motions the reason for her failure to eat. The two men with her said she had not eaten for weeks and had refused all their entreaties to take nourishment.

Police displayed interest in reports that $2,000 Miss Schreiner was presumed to have had in a saving account had been spent while she lay starving. They said, too, they had information that she carried a small insurance policy.
