Thoughts For Our Time

By His Eminence Cardinal McGuigan (Copyright)

The coming of Christ effected a great change in the evaluation of work. He dignified and sanctified labor by His work as a carpenter. The Christian conscience which recognizes in Him the most perfect of the sons of men could no longer hold, as the ancient Greeks did, that work was ignoble. Christ taught the equality of all men before God and issued the call to perfection to all men, to the slaves as well as their masters. No longer could labor be looked upon as something which detracted from human dignity or perfection. No longer could the full human life be reserved for the non-working elite. The perfect human life was no longer the life of speculation about abstract things which required above all generous endowment of intellectual talent. The perfect human life was the life of a saint, a spiritual life which consisted of a constantly deepening experience of God. This was the highest form of human activity and it depended on charity or love. The Christians realized that this form of activity not only need not be divorced from work, but that work could contribute to it even make it possible by removing the obstacles to it.

This was about as far as the Christians went in their realization of Christ's message with regard to work. We see that they believed that the value of work was primarily spiritual. Work was suffering and it put self-discipline into the lives of men. It was useful to discipline the will to pacify inordinate passions, to dissipate the idleness and lassitude. Work emptied the soul of evil in order that it might be made ready for the visit of God. Work, other than what is essentially only an ascetic value. This was true but it was not the full truth. Work also has a positive value. The medieval Christians remained blissfully ignorant of some of the grandeur of work, but they also avoided some of its terrible risks. One of these terrible risks is to make of work a new type of slavery as it became in capitalism; another is to make of work a new heroism sacrificing the worker to work as in Communism.

Literature And Life

By BOOKMAN

PAYING ONE'S DEBT

One of the most delightful things in Robert Louis Stevenson is a passage in his essay "A Night Among the Pines." He tells us what a novel time he had which he felt that he owed somebody money on the ground. This is how he put it: "And so it pleased me in a half laughing way, to leave pieces of money on the turf as I went along, until I had left enough for my night's lodging. I trust they did not fall to some rich and churlish drover." He said that he felt that he was in some one's debt for the liberal entertainment. How true that is we are all in debt, yes deeply in debt. Are we not in debt to the past? There are those who forged out our language; those who wrote our books, built our roads, laid the foundations of our civilization. Can we ever pay our debt to Greece and Rome? Then to come nearer home, can we pay our parents? It is only when we have children of our own and realize what it means to bring them up—watch them, train them, and start them in life that we see what we owe them: Ah! little doth the young one know what power is in his widest scream. Heard by his mother unawares.

Scott-Dunnington Wedding

A very quiet wedding took place in St. Paul's Church, Saturday, June 29th, 1946, at eleven A.M. when Mabel Pauline, youngest daughter of H. B. Scott and the late Mrs. Scott of Marshfield, Prince Edward Island, became the wife of Harold Jordan, son of Mr. and Mrs. J. H. Dunnington, of Sudbury, Ontario. The Rev. Dean Craig performed the ceremony in the presence of relatives and friends. The bride chose for her wedding dress, Navy Blue moire taffeta, trimmed with lace, her accessories were white. The couple were unattended. After the ceremony a luncheon was held at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Ritchie. The bridal couple after honeymooning in several Canadian Towns, will make their home in Toronto. Previous to her marriage the bride was entertained at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Elmer Duffett on Brockview Ave., Toronto, where she received many and beautiful gifts from her friends there.
