PUBLIC MEETING SUMMER SCHOOL

cordial greeting. He hoped that every moment they all spent in the city had been pleasing to them, and that the visitors would carry away with them pleasant memories of the Island province. He felt a delicacy in speaking to them because it was not usual within his province to address such a highly intellectual audience as that, comprising as it did so many distinguished educationalists, and he felt flattered in being allowed the opportunity of saying a few words to the young ladies and gentlemen who had been attending the first Summer School for teachers held by the Government. He had no doubt that when those young teachers went home to their respective districts they would be able to impart to their pupils some of that instruction that they had received at the hands of these learned gentlemen. Great credit was due to the Premier and the Local Government for inaugurating this Summer School for teachers, and he hoped that as time went on, and as the teachers came into Charlottetown every year for their summer school, every effort would be made on the part of the citizens to carry out a program of entertainments that would be acceptable to the teachers and that would reflect credit on the city. He regretted exceedingly that something had not been done on this occasion to make this visit more enjoyable and that would have been more worthy to the citizens of Charlottetown. But they could rest assured that, whoever might occupy the chief Magistracy of the city next year, it would be his duty and the duty also of every citizen, and as a humble citizen he should do everything in his power to see that a proper program was carried out for the entertainment of the teachers of Prince Edward Island, (Applause) and for the entertainment also of these gentlemen from other places who would be there in the role of instructors. He could tell their distinguished visitors that this little province had turned out some of the first educationalists of the day, holding positions not only in the foremost universities but occupying also high positions both in church and state. They felt highly indebted to Prince of Wales College for the great work of education that it had achieved. Boston might be the Athens of the United States, but they could claim for this city the title of the Athens of Canada (great applause.) They had a great deal to feel proud of, and oh! how proud he felt that night as he saw assembled in that hall such a preponderance of youth, beauty and wisdom (renewed applause.) He hoped and trusted that that assembly would be twice as large next year, and it would be worth their while to come to Charlottetown then, because it would be the duty of the citizens to see that proper arrangements were made for their reception. (Applause.)

DR. ROBERTSON PRAISES GOVERNMENT.

Dr. Robertson, Principal of Prince of Wales College, the next speaker, expressed his pleasure at the remarks with which the Premier had opened this session of the Summer School. It was a matter of pure experiment as they might call it in this Province the first that had been attempted. When the school was being planned it was with a great deal of misgiving that he personally looked forward to it. He remembered how difficult the work of the teacher was during the long laborious school year, the loneliness and the small measure of appreciation he got in his own district during the year. He felt that the strain upon them would tempt them to seek rest and recreation and relaxation during the holiday season; he felt that few of them would be willing to surrender their holiday and come into Charlottetown, and go through that course of study that was embodied in the Summer School. He was very much pleased as the time approached for the opening of the school to find indications of a large enrolment, and when it reached 260 he felt that some measure of success was going to attend the venture. But he had the feeling upon him still that it was largely in the nature of a holiday for some ten or twelve days. When the school work began he kept his eyes open, and he could not help but feeling a genuine pleasure as he saw the classes moving about the corridors and the seriousness and energy with which they set about their work they had just left and forecasting the work to which they were going. The pleasure he had thus felt had been experienced by a good many persons present at the school who had had great experience among teachers and of training schools. He thought that that Summer School of Prince Edward Island had been an unequalled success. It must be, he was sure, very gratifying to the Premier and to the members of his Government to find the great body of teachers of this province worthy of the great support and the sympathy that the Government had recently given to them. He thought that they must find in this a very large measure of satisfaction; they could not point to anything that had given them so splendid a return for their efforts. And when the Premier said he hoped that the school would be continued next year, and that improvements would be made such as seemed necessary from the experience of this year, the Premier had given an assurance that the teachers of this island did not yet know all that the Government intended to do for them. (Applause.)

AN AWAKENING.

They had been entertained by the citizens in driving about in motor cars, and he hoped that when teachers came to future summer schools they would be able to ride about the streets of Charlottetown in their own automobiles (Applause.) Dr.

Robertson referred to the interest that had been shown in the teachers and their work at the school by the citizens of Charlottetown, and said that that was another proof that there was an awakening in our people, to the value of the teacher and of education. They were slow and that old apathy and old disregard that the people had had for the teacher had held out too long, but they were now getting awake to the idea that the teachers of any country were an essential factor for the betterment of that country. They might invest their money in real estate or bank notes but they could not better invest their money and get better returns than by investing it in their children, and they could not invest it in a better way than by paying better salaries to the teachers of their children, and getting a better class of teachers (Applause.) They wanted a better type of primary schools in this province; they were getting them gradually, but they wanted to keep at it until they had got them all. There were too many young people in this city and in the country districts that were not getting a fair chance; the parents were too busy to give to the family the attention that the family deserved. They were hoping that their work would be done by the teacher. But they had not taken the pains to see that these teachers were provided for and engaged in their work. "Now, citizens of Charlottetown, you must be earnest in this matter. These children we are talking about are your children; these teachers we are talking about are your children's teachers. And the school boards and every person connected with the education system must put their shoulders to the wheel and put their hands in their pockets and get your better teachers. Assembled in this school you have got practically half the teachers in this province. They are here because they are interested in their school work; they are interested on behalf of their pupils. Are they not worthy of more support? Let us see that the hands of this Government are upheld and that they be warranted in largely increasing the salaries of the teachers of this province." (Applause.)

THE ADVANTAGE OF A GOOD START

The Superintendent of Education, Mr. R. H. Campbell, said that like Dr. Robertson he had his fears and his doubts regarding the success of that school. They might as well know to start with that the idea of the Summer School was Premier Matheson's. It was the Premier's determination that something should be done rather than an unusual character to arouse some enthusiasm in the teachers of this province so that this year's work might begin with greater interest than had been the case with a great number of years in the past. There were difficulties in the way, but difficulties made the Premier all the more determined to overcome them. The Premier had been a very successful teacher and he thought that it was a great factor for the educational interests of this province to have an old teacher as Premier. An old and successful teacher could make an excellent Premier, and an excellent Commissioner of Agriculture, and there were other members of the Provincial Government who had been teachers, while they knew as their friends from the United States could tell them, that a teacher could make an exceedingly able president, even of that great republic. It was a great advantage to this province and for the schools of the province and a great advantage for the educational interests generally that at the head of affairs was a man who had been a teacher. They had been very fortunate also in their instructors, and he thought that they would all bear him out in that. (Applause.) The Superintendent specially emphasized the work that had been done in the school by the four lady instructors of the star—Miss Ives, of the drawing class, had not only shown herself a master of her subject but an exceedingly clever teacher (Applause), while the teaching of Miss Scott, Miss Dorsey and Miss Robertson, in the normal training work had been among the most effective pieces of work in the Summer School. (Applause.) Next Tuesday most of them would begin work for another year; many of them would begin work in absolutely new schools, but whether they began work in an entirely new school, or went back to their old school, they were beginning an absolutely new period of work. They were turning over a new leaf. They had absolutely a clean sheet upon which they could write a fair record of great success during the year. The past might have been full of mistakes, and he had no doubt that the best teachers there felt that last year's work had not very much improved. But the past had passed, and it was valuable for the experiences it had brought, the wisdom it had given, the knowledge of the difficulties they had to overcome. Their faces were turned to the future; let them see to it that they made a good start. They knew that many a race otherwise well run had been lost because of a poor start. They must get off at the crack of the pistol, or they would be out of it altogether. A great deal depended upon the first day; upon the first impressions they made upon the district, upon the children and the children's parents. A good start often would pave the way for them into the good graces of the people, and afterwards many an error on their part would be overlooked. If they did not start well their work and their success would be jeopardized through the coming year. He wanted them to be sure that they started right, that they made the opening of their work a great success; and once having started right, let them keep going; and he was sure that this year would be the best in the history of education in Prince Edward Island.

A CREDITABLE COMPARISON

The next speaker was Inspector Vernon Crockett, who expressed his delight at having been a member of the Summer School. He too had been dubious when the arrangements for the school were being made as to the result that would attend it. He had attended several sessions of the Summer School in the other provinces and he knew something of the work, and at first he did not think that at this summer school they would attain the standard that had been set there. But he was pleased to announce that night, having just returned from the session of the Summer School recently held in Halifax, that it was his candid opinion that in not one essential element had they here behind the work of that year, the Summer School at Halifax this year. It was a matter of satisfaction to the promoters of this undertaking that it had worked out so well. Only instead of fifty per cent. of the teachers being present he wished a hundred per cent. were present. No teacher could fail to derive immense advantage from the course of training they had had at that school. The nature of the work was earnest, enthusiastic, and a more earnest, nature study, and competent staff of instructors he supposed it would have been impossible to have got. "Their work was at an end, ours is just about to begin, and if all the teachers here are able to carry out what we have had in mind these last two weeks I have no doubt but what a revolution, so far as education is concerned, is about to take place in this province." Dealing with the books that had been recommended to them for study, Mr. Crockett said that they were not going to improve themselves a great deal until they were willing to spend a little money on their own responsibility, and he suggested the formation of a traveling library for that purpose in each district. The main thing was to get a few books, and master them, and master them in such a way that the work would be of value to those whom they were teaching. He thought he voiced the sentiments of every teacher there that night when he said that they were very grateful to the local government and the department of education and to every one who had been instrumental in making that meeting of the Summer School the grand success it was. (Applause.)

CREAM OF THE TEACHING PROFESSION.

Principal J. J. Seaman, of Prince Street School, referred to the importance of nature study, and went on to say that he was glad that the teachers had been cautioned that they were not to expect to go back and take up all the things they had been instructed upon, but that they would consider what they were going to do as an attempt to do something along those lines. Those teachers had before them that night he considered the cream of the teaching profession of P. E. Island; those had made a sacrifice and had attended that school; they were glad to be associated with them. He was sure they would join with him in saying that they were very much indebted to the department of agriculture, and to the energetic secretary of agriculture. (Applause.)

UNBOUNDED ENTHUSIASM.

Professor Ross conveyed to the teachers the thanks of the department.

THE VALUE OF ENTHUSIASM.

Inspector Boulter also spoke of the great advantage the school had been to the teachers attending it, and referring particularly to the work of the teachers started the pupils in drawing in the way in which they should be started and carry out the work as suggested by the drawing instructor, they would be doing a great benefit and would repay the district for any time or money that might have been involved in that course. The teachers in country schools were up against a pretty hard proposition, and they must try and improve the conditions if possible, and to do so they must try and get the help of the parents as much as possible; interest the parents; do ment for the way in which they had supported this school, for the enthusiasm, for the willingness they had shown and the willingness with which they were ready to meet the wishes of those who had charge of the school and assist in making the school a success. They had had several difficulties in the way but the teachers had met those little difficulties with such good spirit and with such hearty goodwill that it made the school a great success. (Applause.) They were prepared for an enthusiastic spirit on the part of the teachers in regard to the new teaching by the success that had attended the short course for farmers that had been held last winter; it was evident that the country at large was alive to the importance and necessity of the new education. The enthusiasm of the Summer School knew no bounds, and he was sure that when they went to their schools in the country that fire of enthusiasm would not be burnt out, but would be imparted by them to their pupils. If they had any difficulties in carrying out that new work the department of agriculture stood ready to assist them straight through that work. (Applause.) He hoped that the enthusiasm imbued in that school would continue to grow, and if they were genuinely interested as he believed they were, the difficulties that now confronted them would be overcome. On their behalf and on behalf of the department of agriculture he thanked those instructors who were associated with them in the school and made it the success it was. The singing of the national Anthem and the singing of the national Anthem concluded the proceedings.
