OLD TIME PANCAKES
Magnetic Hill near Moncton N.B.

MOST people who visit Magnetic Hill, near Moncton, N.B., stop at "The Shanty" tearoom for pancakes, a specialty of Miss Muriel Lutes, who is in charge of the tearoom.

"SOME people haven't the knack of making good pancakes," Miss Lutes says. "Our forebears liked them thin, but plentiful, and they liked them served with country sausages or swimming in maple syrup. They are to New Brunswick what beans are to Boston. But, to make good pancakes, you need good flour. Being cooked quickly, it is important to have a fine flour with plenty of 'body' to it, and to my mind there is no flour like Robin Hood for making tasty pancakes.

Her Pancake Secret

"When tourists ask me how I make my pancakes, I always tell them to use Robin Hood Flour. That is my secret not only for pancakes but for all good baking. We have used Robin Hood as long as I can remember for cakes, pies, bread, and, in fact, for all our baking. It is certainly the favorite in this part of the country."

Water-Washed and Guaranteed

Robin Hood Flour carries in each bag a "money-back plus 10%" guarantee certificate. The certificate authorizes your dealer to return your money plus 10 per cent if you do not find that Robin Hood gives you absolute satisfaction in all your baking. Robin Hood is milled from the finest Western wheat and all the wheat is water-washed before being milled into Robin Hood Flour. Order a bag to-day and you'll find that Robin Hood Flour will make your baking lighter and finer with less effort.

MOTHERS SHOULD'NT MEDDLE WITH CHILDREN'S MARRIAGES

Often it is Better to Close Your Eyes if You Don't Like the Mate Your Son or Daughter Has Chosen

Dear Dorothy Dix—After sending our son to high school and college we set him up in business and for two years he was very successful. Then he fell in love with a girl of whom I did not approve. For, although she was a fine girl and had a good education, I did not like her family. So I broke up the match by destroying the letters that she wrote him so that he thought that she had jilted him. He loved her very much and this seemed to break him all up. He lost interest in his business and began drinking for the first time in his life. I know he still loves the girl and she loves him, and my husband says that I should tell him of my deception and let him make up with her; that is, or shall I just trust to luck that he will forget her? A MOTHER.

Dorothy Dix

Answer—The only honorable thing for you to do is to confess to your son what you have done. No doubt it will be a bitter thing for you to have to do this, but it is the least atonement that you can make for the wrong you have done.

Do this at once, for in the state of mind that he is in now, with his faith in women broken by what he believes was the faithfulness of the girl he loved, feeling that his life is broken and that he has no real interest in anything any more, your son is liable, in his drunken state, to fall into the clutches of some low woman who will marry him and wreck him beyond all saving.

Mothers Must Be Careful

This same mail brings me a letter from another mother who has done just as you have. Broken off her son's marriage to a fine girl he loved because she was poor and she wanted him to marry a rich girl of her choosing. She carried her point and now sees her son bitterly unhappy, married to an unloved wife who is a shrew and who makes his life a hell on earth with her nagging and tyrannies.

All of which goes to show how careful mothers should be before they meddle with their children's love affairs. Of course, Mother always thinks she knows best, and that she is far more capable of picking out suitable mates for her children than they are for themselves, but this is not true. Tastes differ in love as they do in everything else in life, and the man or woman who would suit Mother might be utterly distasteful to her children.

Each heart knows its own needs and Mother intermeddles with it at her peril.

MIXED MARRIAGE NEEDS TOLERANCE

Dear Dorothy Dix—I have fallen in love with a man who is of a different religion from mine. Our tastes are similar. We like the same kind of amusements, books, entertainments and people. We enjoy dancing and playing together. We have the same political views. We enjoy the same jokes. We have many mutual friends. We like each other's families and our families like us and each other. In fact, everything seems almost perfect, except that we are of different religions.

We have talked this point over and have come to an agreement which seems beyond reproach. Nevertheless, we feel that we would like to have your opinion as to what chance we have of a happy life together. DOROTHY.

Answer—It seems the most ironic thing on earth that religion, which teaches the gospel of love, should so often separate the man and woman who love each other. For myself I cannot understand how a difference in creed matters, since they are all only different roads to the acquaintances, improve your health, replenish ambition and energy.

A CHILD BORN ON THIS DAY. An interesting combination of Leo-Virgo characteristics. Steadfastness of purpose, poise, courage, good reasoning and good looks are only part of this likeable individual's heritage. The cool judgment of Virgo helps to temper the impulsive exuberance and daring of Leo. This child needs intelligent understanding.

A Morning Smile

He was relating his adventures to his fiancée and she said, "I had to hack my way through almost impenetrable jungle," he said. "Chopping, slashing at thick undergrowth and trees."

"Oh, George," she said, "you'll be an expert at weeding the garden!"

Four Tommies had settled down to a game of cards in a quiet corner of the trenches. Suddenly a great commotion was heard, and one of the players jumped up to the lookout step.

"Hi, you fellows!" he shouted. "A whole enemy division coming over!"

Another Tommy got up with a bored look on his face.

"All right," he said. "You get on with the game. I'm dummy this hand; I'll go."

There are some new wood preservatives on the market which may be brushed or sprayed on wood or in which wood may be dipped. Some of these preservatives are moisture repellent and act as a toxic so that insect attacks are discouraged. Fungus or bacterial growths which cause wood to decay are prevented.

At least one of these products, which was primarily intended for marine use is made of metallic salts in a liquid vehicle. These are insoluble in salt or fresh water and they are non-volatile.

"Frills is looking well, though, don't you think, mother?" asked Neil, "Doc spoke of it to me today. She's been keeping sort of quiet since the accident and getting in a lot of sleep."

When they were outside the house, Joycel, seized by a sudden impulse, said to Neil, "Look here, I'll be right out again, and turning she went back into the house. Mrs. Packard who had been sitting quietly gazing out of the window looked up in surprise when she saw her daughter-in-law reappear.

Joycel ran across the room and kneeling beside the chair, she said hastily, before her courage should fail her.

"Do you go you suppose we could be friends, after all? Or has Frills or I have been too awful?" To her dismay she saw Mrs. Packard's eyes fill with quick tears and a flush mounted to her forehead.

"I'm coming again soon, alone, and then well . . . we'll get acquainted," stammered Joycel. She rose and lifting her head nearer, kissed Mrs. Packard lightly. Then she ran out of the room to Neil.

When they got back to the house Joycel was relieved to find that they had no company.

"Let's see what on the radio to-night?" suggested Neil. Joycel assented, rather curious to hear. She soon discovered that Neil's idea of enjoying the radio was to spend all his time and effort trying to get distant stations.

Joycel, bored finally at the superlatives of the unseen speaker who was boasting enthusiastically for the glories of California, got up and said goodnight, hoping that Neil would remain downstairs.

Packard immediately shut off the radio and announced his intention of accompanying her. By the air of happy expectation on his face, Joycel realized that she was about to reap the inevitable results of her friendliness toward him that day.

She decided this time to take no chance of repeating the soap incident and when they reached the bedroom she turned to him and said, "Goodnight, Neil, I'm going to read for a while."

LISTEN—THE CHILD!

All that you dreamed—but dared not, Whatever you wished—but willed not, The good you grasped—but held not— These look up at you from my eyes. In me you and your world can be made new.

Touch me with love—and I will mould the world in the pattern of fellowship. Nurture me with understanding—and I will fashion it by goodwill. Guide my steps and mind into the joyous acceptance of law and order—and I will find Him who stretched the heavens with a span and ordained the rhythmic order of the seasons and of life.

Thus, in me can be fulfilled the ancient word: "Behold, I make all things new."

CHAPTER XIII

Far in the hills Joyce had found a little group of pines on the edge of a towering redwood grove. When she lay down on her back in the warm sunshine and looked up through the pines at the blue sky, she felt as if she were floating in space.

She lay thinking of Neil, and with a little thrill of satisfaction she decided that he showed no evidence of missing the old Frills.

She had now met practically every one who moved in their circle in Manzanita and had found out enough of their history and circumstances so that she could get by safely in most cases.

The month was not yet up but Joyce, summarizing her impressions and the knowledge she had gathered, felt that she had given her environment a fair study and was en-
