1878—1925! HISTORICUS.

Now that the general election has been announced to take place on Oct. 29th, next, the electors of Canada have been brought face to face with the most momentous question that has been raised since the general election of 1873. At that time the issue was that the people should choose between a Tariff for Revenue only or a Protective Tariff. It is precisely the same today. In 1873 the McKenzie Government had fully tested the Tariff for Revenue policy very fully and found it a complete failure. This policy had threatened the existence of the new Canadian Confederation. The country then responded to the call of Sir John A. Macdonald and adopted a Protective policy which continued in operation until 1891 when he passed away and when its effects proved beyond doubt that it was the most conducive to the welfare of the people. It lifted the industries of the country into a prosperous condition. Canada was raised to the status of a nation, and under Sir Wilfrid Laurier's Government, which came into power in 1896 and its successors, it has been adhered to on a reduced scale until the present time. Now, however, Premier Mackenzie King has completely cast aside the protectionist principle, and proposes to govern the country with Alexander Mackenzie's defunct policy of a Tariff for Revenue only. Thus we are asked to pull down the sound and well-tried policy of Protection and to destroy the sound foundation on which Canada has prospered far beyond the hopes of its founders. There is no doubt whatever that Premier King has committed a national blunder, and if Canada is as true to its interests as it was in 1873 it will teach Mr. King and his colleagues a lesson which they will never forget. It is fortunate, however, that the King Government are not done with their National Blunder. Owing to existing circumstances they are now compelled to face the country for a verdict and it is pleasing to note that the country is coming back to its old sturdy and splendid shape. From East to West the spirit of 1873 is spreading with greater strength than ever. Already the tariff issue which the King Government has raised is causing quite a storm among their own followers. It was predicted when Sir Lomer Gouin retired that Quebec would revolt against making Canada a dumping-ground for the manufactures of other countries, and it now appears that Ontario will also rise against the destruction of its manufacturing industries. Already the Toronto Globe, the principal organ of the party has declared itself opposed to the King Government, whilst the Edmonton Journal has stood up for Protection to suit all sections of Canada. Thus the revolt against the Government has started, and started well. The Liberal forces of Ontario such as the Globe are not prepared to take part in pulling down the industrial establishments of that great province, and no doubt there are in other provinces many who will follow in its footsteps. The King Government have evidently lost themselves. Who would have ever thought it possible that such a staunch old newspaper as the Toronto Globe would break with the Liberals if they were worthy of support. But its defection only shows how heavy the burden of the blow inflicted in this case. The policy that would unquestionably shatter the manufacturing industry of the country does not appeal to men who do their own thinking. The annual product of those industries amount to $2,444,725,684. Just think of it! They are only second to our agricultural industry. Our manufacturing industries are therefore too vast to be thrown into the lap of foreigners. They have been built up at too great a sacrifice to be trifled with. Every province will no doubt rally against such a proposition.

Chic suits which are composed of plain jacket and figured or plaided skirt have come in for popularity of late. Such a model as the one above makes an ideal suit for early Fall wear. The material is broadcloth. The box jacket is of beige broadcloth, and the skirt is plaided in beige, brown, yellow and blue. Tailored two-piece suits which exploit the bolero jacket are also coming into favor. These are worn with tailored blouses of batiste.

When May found herself back in Montreal a week later, it seemed to her for a moment that the last eighteen months of her life had been a bad dream. The world beyond the railroad station seemed suddenly remote and unreal to her. Had she ever really been away from home? Had she really ever known such people as Carlotta and Dan and Herbie Waterbury? They seemed like dim figures in a half-forgotten dream, now that she was back here where she belonged. When the taxicab drew up before the white house with green shutters where lived the young Dick Gregor, and Gloria herself came out to welcome her, May knew suddenly that she could never go away from Montreal again. Why, it was home to her! And these friends of hers were all she had to live for, now that everything else seemed to have turned to dust and ashes before her very eyes! "You lucky girl!" she said to Gloria, who she had eaten a late supper of chicken sandwiches and tea, and the two friends stood beside Dicky Junior's little white bed in the big white nursery upstairs. "You lucky girl!" she said again. "Don't you know that this little white house, and the husband and child who live here with you, are the real joy of living?" She said it breathlessly, as if she had just made a great discovery. But Gloria only laughed. "The gentle happy laugh of a woman who has found the glowing heart of life, itself. "Of course, I know it," she answered in a self-whisper so as not to waken the baby. "Marriage and motherhood... that's the highest happiness any woman can have. May, that's what we're born for—we women." Silently May nodded. Then she gave herself a nervous little shake and ran a hand through her short, gleaming hair. "I'm going to burst into tears in another minute," she said pertly. "If we go on talking like a couple of Sunday School teachers! Come on downstairs, and we'll ripple up a rag on the radio, eh, what?" But after all she did not go downstairs again. In the hall she stopped at the head of the long flight that led to the lower floor, and put her hand to her forehead. "Fiendish heads—the... I've had it all day," she explained to Gloria. "I had forgot all about it in the excitement of seeing you folks again. But it's killing me, and I guess bed's the best place to take it. Say good-night to Dick for me, won't you? Oh, but I'm glad to be here with you! It's like home to me—your house!" And when she sank into the lavender-scented bed with its soft pillows and spotless sheets, a sense of peace poured itself into her soul like oil on troubled waters. She slept like the baby in the nursery across the hall. For months she had not had a night's sleep like this. In hotels the sound of doors closing, of telephones ringing in nearby rooms, had broken her sleep. The rattle of trains had always kept her

MAY SEYMOUR FOOT LOOSE by BEATRICE BURTON ONE!

When May found herself back in Montreal a week later, it seemed to her for a moment that the last eighteen months of her life had been a bad dream. The world beyond the railroad station seemed suddenly remote and unreal to her. Had she ever really been away from home? Had she really ever known such people as Carlotta and Dan and Herbie Waterbury? They seemed like dim figures in a half-forgotten dream, now that she was back here where she belonged. When the taxicab drew up before the white house with green shutters where lived the young Dick Gregor, and Gloria herself came out to welcome her, May knew suddenly that she could never go away from Montreal again. Why, it was home to her! And these friends of hers were all she had to live for, now that everything else seemed to have turned to dust and ashes before her very eyes!

"Orange juice, eggs, and potatoes hashed in cream," she recited gaily, as she set it down on May's bed and uncovered the steaming dishes, "Hot rolls and coffee! Now, isn't that as good a breakfast as you'd have in a hotel?" May groaned. "It's so much better than quail on toast would be in a lonely hotel room!" she answered. "My dear child, if you'd been tossed around the world as I've been for the last year or so, you'd have some idea of what 'home' means to me."

She unfolded her napkin and drained her glass of orange juice before she went on: "I wish you'd seen the boarding house in Los Angeles that was my last stopping place!... Dirty and old and smelly! And the meals! Oh, Gloria, I wish you'd seen some of the meals!" She shuddered. "I thought Ulysses Forgan's check never would come," she cried, "I thought I'd have to stay in that horrible place forever!" She looked up at her friend and saw that her eyes had lost their friendly gleam. "Ulysses Forgan's check?" Gloria repeated. "Why, how did you happen to be taking money from Ulysses Forgan?" May flushed. "I wasn't taking money from him," she said, and two red spots of fiery indignation burned on her cheek-bones. "I simply asked him to lend me enough money to bring me home!"

Gloria slowly shook her head. "I still don't understand why you borrowed from him. Why couldn't you have asked Dick to send you money?" she wanted to know. May shrugged her shoulders under the pink silk sleeves of her bed jacket. "Oh, I don't know!" she said airily. "I just happened to think of 'Forgan'!" (To be Continued.)

SUCCESSFUL CONVENTION AT MT. STEWART

About sixty teachers from the surrounding districts met in Convention at Mt. Stewart on Friday, 28 inst. The meeting was called to order by Inspector Doyle, and Mr. Cecil Devereaux was elected president for the current year. After welcoming the teachers and urging them to take part in the discussions, the new president complimented the teachers on the large attendance, and spoke of the great difficulties facing beginners, and of the poor attendance usually found this time of year. He gave some good advice in regard to discipline and said that where good industrial pupils are found good discipline results. He advised the teachers to visit the homes and try to get the pupils to attend school as soon as possible after it opens. Following Inspector Doyle, Inspector Hynes outlined the school work for the ensuing year, referring especially to punctuality, attendance and the necessity of having the school clean at all times. He outlined an excellent plan for a Time Table and advised having the teacher post it on the first day and modify it as classes are arranged. He dwelt in detail on Physical Drill, well-organized games and recreation, current events, manners and morals, and singing, and pointed out to the teachers the importance of showing good example to their pupils.
