Daughter Of Exile

Halford had broken his glass, he had been aware of an uneasy atmosphere in the room. Mrs. Macpherson, as her father proceeded, had looked more and more uncomfortable. Shane decided the time had come to break up the party. The captain rose suddenly, Halford a little more reluctantly. "It's been very good of you," began Captain Macpherson, when a gust of wind struck round the building, crowning his words. Pelmann frowned. "The storm seems to be very bad," he said. "Let us have a look out of doors." They trooped along the passage into the hall-way. Outside, the night was black as pitch. The edge of the cliffs a few feet away was invisible, but they could hear the breakers pounding on the rocks far below. The noise was like the booming of cannon. Shane ventured outside and instantly a giant hand clutched at him and threw him breathless against the stone ramparts of the house. The driving rain cut against his cheek like chips of ice. He struggled back into the shelter of the doorway. He had only been out a couple of seconds, but he was almost drenched. Pelmann spoke with decision. "I cannot let you go in this. The path is not too safe, and I should never forgive myself if any of you met with an accident. You shall be my guests until the morning, and then we shall see what the weather is like. "These storms come and go in a few hours at this time of the year," said Captain Macpherson. "It'll be gone by the morning. "It's only a few steps to the Lighthouse," said Shane to his host. "Really, there's no need." The captain added his voice to Shane's. Halford said nothing. But Pelmann brushed aside their objections. "It is no trouble at all. I shall be honoured if you will stay. If you will return to the library meanwhile, I shall instruct my servant." He turned and left them. Shane became aware of Martha's hand on his arm. Her face was troubled. "What is it?" he said in an undertone. "Please stay." "It's awfully good of your father," said Shane. "But really there's not the slightest danger." "There may be here. That's why I want you to stay. I shall feel safer."

Old Times South Of The Hillsboro

By LUDLOW JENKINS

DROWNING ACCIDENT

He ran what was called the Upper Mill on the site of the old French one, later sold to the Acorns. It was in this mill pond that Miss M. Edwards, an aunt of the Smiths of Pownal, when trying to cross it on the ice in the spring of the year along with Dobson Jenkins a friend of hers, was drowned. It seems she was to meet a boy friend, incidentally the first settler in Mount Albion, at William Jenkins' and the ice being bad she fell through and was drowned. Nicholas settled in Pownal where many of his descendants still reside. Henry was given the old home-stead but never married. Jilted when a young man he ever after kept the female sex on their own side of the fence and was always very particular to lock the door of his pew in church for fear some of them would come in and sit beside him. John settled in Mill View where some of his descendants still reside.

fond of the cup which cheers. He would take a job of stumping, work factually any well unless it was done, then off to the city where Harvies Brig usually claimed him for a while. He will be remembered by many of the present generation as a harmless, innocent man, a great worker, a past master with the axe. He died in Mount Albion, mourned by many without an enemy, and with many friends.

EARLY SHIP BUILDING

The only mill in Mount Albion was one built and owned by James Jenkins who had a flour pearing and saw mill on the same stream as the Acorn Mills, on property now owned by the late Robert Longworth. The stream was quite large at this time. It drained the section of land from Moss Lake westward and was fed by numerous strong springs. Moss Lake is on the summit of the Watershed and although it has a couple of springs in it, it has no outlet the waters from near by running westward to Pownal Bay, south to Seal River and north and east to Glenfinnan River. Mr. Jenkins later on moved to Grand River, Kings County, where he built a number of ships for the late Robert Longworth, just north of what is now called Bridgeville. Where he was known as "Shipbuilder Jim". He was a rather remarkable man, never kept books. When launching his last vessel, sitting on a chair at the bowsprit, he was asked to remark, "I say she is only a boat, she has got to go". Mr. Longworth said "Yes she has got to go she will be the last and we will call her the James".

Mr. Jenkins bought the valuable property of Captain Dingwell at Orwell, N.S., which he divided up among his three sons and where some of his grand, grand grand and great great grandchildren still reside. In gathering material for these notes was struck by the number of mills which used to be running in the old days. The Old Herds Mill on the head waters of the Glenfinnan River; The Lounds and Pergusons Mills on the head waters of the Johnston's River; The Forbes, two Stewarts and Boyer Mills on the head waters of Fullerton's Creek; the two Jenkins and Acorn Mills as well as the Wright's Mill on streams running into Pownal Bay, all gone. The only one running is a Roller Mill run by Earl Long on about the same site as one of the old Stewart mills. Opposite this creek on the north side of the river was the large establishment run by the Wrights which consisted of a threshing mill, flour and barley mill, as well as a brewery and distillery.

Denies Interest In Coalition Gov't.

OTTAWA, May 2 (CP) - M. J. Coldwell (CCF-Rosevelt-Bligar) denied in a statement tonight that he was associating with other politicians with a view to forming a coalition government in Canada in opposition to Social Credit. In a despatch from Medicine Hat, Hon. W. A. Fallow, Alberta minister of public works, was reported as saying last night that Mr. Coldwell was "chomping" Premier Duplessis of Quebec, Hon. R. J. Manion and Hon. H. H. Stevens, former Conservative provincial ministers, in a coalition government as a goal. "The statement is as false as it is absurd," Mr. Coldwell's statement said. "I demand a retraction." He added that he had never met premiers Hepburn or Duplessis, met Mr. Manion casually several years ago and knew Mr. Stevens as a fellow member of the commons.

ond, Mr. Charles C. Gallant. A few games of bingo were then played, after which a dainty lunch was served by the hostess assisted by Misses Elise Gallant and Pearl Corcoran. A few hours' dancing was then enjoyed by the guests of evening amounting to $400.

Oppose Exhibition Opening Sundays

(By The Associated Press) CALGOW, May 2 (CP) - A 450m broke today over the British Empire Exhibition to be opened here next Tuesday by the King and Queen. Cause of the controversy was a move to keep it open on Sundays. The Lord's Day Observance Society of England sent a telegram to officials stating it viewed "with grave concern agitation to open the Empire Exhibition on Sundays and protests against such an attempt" being made within a few days of the official opening by His Majesty the King. Other religious groups were making similar representations but officials, pending a final decision, have not replied. Officials said they expected at least 15,000,000 persons to attend the show, Scotland's first exhibition since the one Glasgow staged in 1901. It will last until October. Canada is represented by an elaborate exhibit, housed in the Canadian pavilion.
