THE KIND HUSBAND

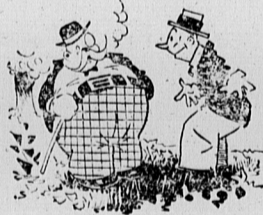

At playing a quiet game of draw He knew he was a hummer, And through the scheme his wife never saw When he sent her away for this summer.

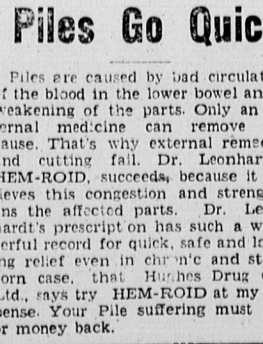

"He Bangs of an optimistical turn!" "Is he! Why, he can laugh while he's playing solitaire!"

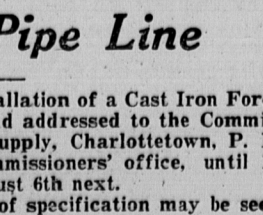

"Do you believe in reciprocity?" "Well, I don't know that I'm sure just what it means. Something connected with a kiss, isn't it?"

Yankee Tourist: I always thought that this part of England was full of beautiful ruined dual castles. Native: So it was, too, until yer bloomin' Hamerican helresses married off all our docks and put the castles in good repair, blast the luck!

"I will try and make you understand why it concerns you, Lady Augusta. I have come a long way for the purpose."

"When my daughter married your nephew, she cuts herself off from us. She deliberately made her choice. She knew what would happen. My husband had informed Captain Bradford very clearly. He refused even to discuss the affair as a possibility. Therefore it is at an end."

Married Quarters

By DAVID JYALL

Continued

"Yes, she is; but her ladyship is very busy, ma'am, and only sees callers by appointment."
"I have no appointment, but I have come a long way to see her."
"Please to step in ma'am, and I will take your name to her ladyship."
"But I do not wish to send in my name," said Naomi gently and politely. "Will you be so good as to go and say to Lady Augusta that a lady has come a long way to see her, and that the matter is of urgent importance? You might say, if you like, that it has nothing to do with war work, but is a personal matter."
The butler looked at her intently and inclined a grave but friendly head.

"Very good, ma'am. I'll take your message. Will you be so good as to step in here?"
"Mayn't I wait in this lovely old hall?" asked Naomi, on the spur of the moment, and in the most natural voice in the world.
"Surely, ma'am," he answered, and set a chair for her before he began to ascend the stairs with the soft measured footfall of the perfectly trained servant.

Naomi sank into the chair and looked round her with a little gasp. It was absolutely beautiful, and when she recalled the horrid little passages at Archer's Farm, the cheap waxcloth coverings, the whole aspect of the place, her pity for Poppy was unbounded, and her wonder over the whole ghastly disaster of the marriage profound. She had about five minutes to wait before the man returned.

"Her ladyship will see you, ma'am. Please to come upstairs."
"Oh, thank you very much," she said, rising with alacrity and following him up the wide staircase on whose soft Persian carpets the step gave forth no sound. Naomi's heart did not even beat faster as she followed across a wide landing, and passed through the door which the butler opened for her.

It was Lady Augusta's boudoir in which she was received, and her memory of it afterwards was not very clear.

But she never forgot the majestic figure of Lady Augusta as she saw it standing near the wood fire, a figure in sombre black, unrelieved by any touch of white, her dark-skinned face looking harsh and not very inviting. Naomi sped forward and felt the scrutiny of a very keen pair of black eyes.

"You wished to see me?" said Lady Augusta, and her tone was wonderfully friendly. There was something even in the first impression of Naomi Bradford which disarmed her and removed a part of her cold dignity.

"Yes, it is good of you to let a stranger come up," said Naomi in a very clear voice. "I was afraid if I sent up my name you might refuse. It is Bradford."

"Bradford!" repeated Lady Augusta with a distinct frown and a hostile note in her voice.
"Naomi Bradford, I am the aunt of Captain Bradford, who married your daughter."
"Oh, indeed!"

More Lady Augusta did not say, nor did she so much as ask Naomi to be seated.

"I am his maiden aunt, Miss Naomi Bradford, and I may as well say at once that I am here to-day without his knowledge or Poppy's. I saw her yesterday."

Naomi was perfectly conscious that Lady Augusta winced at her utterance of Poppy's name.

"Well, and how does all this concern me?" asked Lady Augusta coolly.

"I will try and make you understand why it concerns you, Lady Augusta. I have come a long way for the purpose."

"When my daughter married your nephew, she cuts herself off from us. She deliberately made her choice. She knew what would happen. My husband had informed Captain Bradford very clearly. He refused even to discuss the affair as a possibility. Therefore it is at an end."
"It cannot be at an end," said Naomi quietly and very clearly still, "because Poppy is your daughter, and that is a tie which nothing, not even death, can break."

"Well, what is the matter with her?" asked Lady Augusta sharply, and with a sudden gesture put her hand to her heart.

"She is quite well in body, but— but she needs you, Lady Augusta, and I have come to fetch you."

Naomi never understood then, nor at any other time, where she got either her inspiration or her words. Nothing could have been more discouraging or more hostile than the woman before her, but her courage never failed.

"To fetch me! Where to? I don't even know where she is."

"She has written several times, Lady Augusta—she told me so."

"I do not open her letters," said Lady Augusta calmly. "I decided on that when the calamity happened. Naomi did not speak for a second or so, and they eyed one another steadily.

"Won't you sit down?" came in a jerk from Lady Augusta's lips. "You look dead tired."

"I am tired. I started from Markyate this morning at half-past six."
"On a perfectly futile errand. What is the matter with my daughter? I meant the question so as the more quickly to bring this interview to an end."

"I think you repeat it because you are interested," said Naomi with her sudden sweet smile which had won many a hard heart. "Tell me, Lady Augusta, do you know anyone of the Vandaleur stationed at Braughing Camp?"

"Vandaleur? I know Captain Vandaleur of the Buffs, but I know nothing about Braughing Camp. Where is Braughing, and what has it to do with Poppy? I thought she went to live at a place called Markyate."

"Braughing Camp is close to Markyate. Captain Bradford is stationed there too, and is living with his wife at an old farmhouse on its fringes. That is why I am here to-day."

"Please explain yourself. I suppose Captain Vandaleur has met my unhappy child and they have renewed, as was natural, the friendship of their youth?"

"It is something more than that," said Naomi, with a sudden grimness all the more impressive because it was so entirely foreign to her nature. "I went to see Poppy at Archer's Farm yesterday—already it seems centuries ago—and I found this young man on his knees by her side on the porch."
