Daring Stunts Are Easy For Joe E. Brown

Once an acrobat, always an acrobat, time worn adage of the show world is borne out in the case of Joe E. Brown.

The wide-mouthed comedian, who has returned after a tour of Alaskan army camps, does everything but break his neck in Columbia's "The Daring Young Man," hilarious comedy now at the Capitol Theatre.

During the course of filming, Joe fopped halfway down a bowling alley attached to a ball, was blown into the air following a bomb explosion, walked along the cornice of a building fifteen stories above the street, dove through a plate glass window and rode on the running board of a car careening through traffic at a forty-mile clip.

And he just recovered from a siege of arthritis.

Besides Brown, other members of the cast include Marguerite Chapman, Roger Clark, William Wright, Claire Dodd, Don Douglas, Frank Sully, Lloyd Bridges, Ben Carter and Eddie Laughton. Frank R. Strayer directed from an original screen play by Karen Wolf and Connie Lee. The last film was produced by Robert Sparks.

Starrett Stars As "Buckaroo!"

Flying hoofs will thunder across the Empire Theatre screen tonight when Charles Starrett rolls the rustlers in Columbia's "The Fighting Buckaroo," which is scheduled to make its local bow. In addition to Starrett, who portrays an ex-Texas Ranger, the cast also includes laughable, lovable Arthur "Arkansas" Humplcutt vivacious Kay Harris and Ernest Tubb who is accompanied in his western ballads by Johnny Luther's Ranch Boy.

Directed by William Berke, the new western promises thrills galore as Starrett takes the trail of a band of cattle rustlers. As the story opens, the Cattleman's Association in a vain attempt to advance reports, Starrett enters the case upon the request of Kay Harris, whose fiancée and the prominent lawyer is about proving Brown's innocence; capturing the actual outlaws at the same time.

All That Glitters

After that idea was funneled into Isabel in any way, no bound to him to understand, vaguely and delicately. "If anything should ever happen" to Stephen, she would marry him after a proper period of mourning. But now that more than ten years had passed since she first said this, Giles was something might happen to Stephen, he were too remote to bank on. look and act, talk, seated at his fireside, presiding at his table, accompanying him as he made his visits, became more and more inescapable.

"Would you care to come up for a nightcap? I'd like to talk to you for a few minutes." Zoe had broken in abruptly on his reverie. It was not often she succeeded in coming in when he took her home from a party, and he accepted her invitation with pleased astonishment. Zoe would not let him help fix their drinks. She said he looked tired and cold that he must take things easy and get warm; she would have everything ready in just a jiffy.

During her brief absence she had taken off her evening gown, and had put on a respectable and was suitable and becoming, but it was not ill-naturedly intimate in character; Giles knew that the change had been made merely from motives of economy and comfort. "Glad you're aboard," she said, raising her glass. It was his own favorite greeting, and it pleased him that she contentedly, looking at the fire, and screeching to wonder what Zoe might have on her mind. Then she told him.

"I am, you know. Glad to have you aboard, I mean. But has it occurred to you that if you're aboard too often, we might have heavy weather?"

"No. Of course not. You're a very discerning young woman. But why should that mean heavy weather?"

"Because we're just good companions. We couldn't ever be anything else."

"Why not, Zoe?"

"I thought there was a very special reason so far as you were concerned. In fact, I've been repeatedly informed, several times, that there was. If it hadn't been, I'd have told you there was a special reason so far as I was concerned
